In some houses, nothing can ever be found when wanted. Umbrellas, for example, have a way of concealing themselves in dark corners of the closet or behind coats and wraps. Up comes a storm, suddenly. There is a wild rush and scurry, and a frantic search everywhere for an umbrella. As for overshoes, they are hidden under the hat-rack, beneath the lounge, under the bed; they are never where they should be, or else, the overshoes of the entire family are thrown into a promiscuous, jumbled heap on the floor of a pantry, perhaps in among pots of jam and jars of preserves, and close to piles of old newspapers and magazines. Anything is possible in a haphazard household where there is no system. It costs as much exertion to start an unmethodical family for the day, getting the boys to business and the children to school, as in another well-managed house, would send them all on their way to Europe, or California.

Attention to little things, the small, uncalendared things of life, would modify trouble, ease friction, and save temper. Most of us behave respectably when great difficulties confront us. But some of us fail wofully in the little things that make their presence known at the last moment, and then cause exasperation through their very pettiness. By beginning a half-hour earlier in the morning, numbers of people would escape no end of vexation and embarrassment. Hurry lays waste lives that might move smoothly on, if the beginning of things did not jostle and distress at the hour when the end should be in sight. "I have seen Mildred going to the country," said a friend, "with the whole family clamorous for fear she would lose the train, and the dressmaker rushing after her to the carriage, stitching the last bow on the back of her gown as she tore along." An extreme instance of the discomfort of ignoring a little thing called punctuality.

Excellent people forget the little courtesies that make for happiness. "How ill you are looking," they say, or "How you have changed! I never would have known you had I seen you anywhere unexpectedly!" To be bluntly informed that one is looking ill or old, is quite enough to tack a few years on a middle-aged face, or to make a well person feel much below condition. The tactful and well-mannered woman or man never blunders in little things like these.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—Gene. Your friend's "No" may not be final. Try again.

—Josephine. Answer any invitation as promptly as possible.

—Doris. Have patience with your brother. Boys are trying at sixteen, but they grow out of a good many foolish phases.

—Alma. Please do not say "gentleman friend." This expression is vulgar. Drop the "gentleman" part.

—Rose. If you are going to stay longer than the other callers, rise with the hostess and remain standing until they have left the room.

—Lena. Housework is excellent for developing the muscles of the chest and back. You would probably feel better if you dismissed your second maid and did her work.

—Mary. The misunderstanding between your friend and yourself can be easily explained by a quiet good-tempered talk over the matter.

—Mrs. R. N. H. You ask is it right to carry on a whispering conversation in the presence of a third person. No, it is never polite to whisper in company, but on the other hand it is better for an elderly lady to pass it over than to reprove it, as thoughtless young people sometimes take offence. Your other question, should the host ignore the improper behavior of the lady toward his wife, simply because she is a visitor, is interesting. At a least he is obliged to be civil. The best way in the case if a guest is lost to all sense of propriety, is never to invite her again.

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

"MR. STANTON tells me there were about four hundred men soundly converted during the meetings. You say almost none of these men are going out into your new company?"

"Practically none of them. But it makes little difference. The Lenox mills will have to close down when we pull out."

"Do you really believe that?" Wrightam asked the question keenly. Back of it lay all his past shrewd knowledge of facts in the commercial world.

"I know it," Harvey said; but in spite of himself there was a note of uneasiness in his tone.

"I do not, Harvey. If you imagine Commings and men like him are going to let the Lenox and Oreville plants lie idle and permit you to open up without rivalry, you are very much mistaken. There are two thousand men idle now in Raymond, who, with a month's experience could operate the Lenox mills fairly well. You have chosen a poor time to pull out. There are hundreds of good furnace-men who will rush into Lenox and Oreville to take your place."

"We expect to get our share of the Raymond men," Harvey replied doggedly.

Wrightam shook his head. "After all, these things are not the important ones. Even granting that you have a clear field to organize and operate under the most favorable circumstances, Brother Harvey, I believe you are destined to fail in the end, because you are leaving out of the enterprise the great essential to any solution of the whole terrible Labor question."

"What's that?" Harvey asked incredulously. Not even his close acquaintance with Stanton and knowledge of his convictions prepared him for Wrightam's obvious answer. He had been too long accustomed to thinking of Wrightam as an enemy, as a money-lover. He could not readjust his thought of the man.

"You leave out the religious love of man for man, Harvey. You are going to do with your new industrial combination just what men like me (as I used to be) have been doing in the past. The entire Labor question could be solved in ten years, or less, if men loved one another. It can never be solved around the sign of the dollar, as fought for by either party. Men have need to be born again. The first object in life is the Kingdom of God. And even if you seem to succeed in your enterprise and do not have love, it will profit you nothing."

Harvey listened, angered. Was this J. B. Wrightam, the captain of industry, the financier who for years had dictated terms to Lenox, and held the fortunes of thousands in his pocket?

He looked at Wrightam more carefully. The one thing that struck him most of all as he looked was the peace on Wrightam's face. It was unmistakable. The next thing was the happiness. There was an actual glow on those large, heavy features that even Harvey could not explain.

"Fanatic!" he said to himself. Still he did not believe in the man's transformation. The whole thing was absurd. It was also irritating, and he got up suddenly, as if the atmosphere of the "den" had become choking to him.

"I didn't come here to be preached to," he said sharply. "Good evening."

"Good night," Wrightam said calmly. "If I can be of service sometime, perhaps——"

Harvey turned at the door, and looked back curiously. Wrightam was standing under the light, the expression on his face unchanged.

"Are you going to continue with the Lenox company?" Wrightam had gone out of the bank. Harvey knew that.

"I handed in my resignation to-day. It will be public news to-morrow."

Harvey stepped back into the room. A question trembled on his lips as a sudden possibility flashed into his mind.

"Do you suppose—?" the question remained unasked. Harvey still doubted. The miracle was too great to be credited. He abruptly turned and went away, and Wrightam did not know how near Harvey had come to making a most astounding proposition to the former head of the Lenox mills.

This proposition that nearly came from the Labor leader was an offer to Wrightam to come into the new enterprise as its general manager. For all Harvey's assurance, he had at heart a deep misgiving concerning the management of affairs. There were scores of men out of Lenox mills who could act as foremen or heads of departments, but did he have material capable of general oversight in the administration of such a huge affair? He silently went over the list of possible managers, and the enumeration did not reassure him.

He mentioned his doubts to Stanton.

"Why don't you ask Wrightam to take charge?" Stanton queried.

"I don't trust him, to tell the truth. I don't really believe in what you call his conversion."

Stanton was angry.

"What do you want for proof? Are you waiting for miracles?"

"I don't understand him," Harvey replied sullenly.

"And, of course, you don't believe anything you don't understand! If that was logically your creed, Harvey, you could not breathe another second. But you will learn, in time, that Wrightam is converted as truly as St. Paul was. As to the management, though, as I think it over, I don't believe Wrightam would take it now. He is going through a crisis in his business relations, and has not yet satisfied himself as to his future."

Stanton was exactly right. In the mind of the magnate there was, as yet, an unexplored and unknown world before him. He needed time to work it out. His heart was at peace. But the problem of his future was not yet revealed to him in its details. He was conscious, as such a man would be, of possessing unusual powers in the way of administration and organizing ability. Somewhere in God's great world he believed there was an honest place for the exercise of those powers to the glory of God's Kingdom on the earth, and in the confident belief he now reposed in his heavenly Father, he bided his time and went his way, facing the loss of his wealth with a quiet fortitude that amazed both friends and enemies.

One evening, a year after this conversation, he came home and met Eileen in the hall. She had daily grown in the grace of affection, and the brightest part of the day for Wrightam was that period when he returned from the complicated settlement of his changed business relations, to the house where his daughter was growing into a place of respect, as well as love.

Mrs. Wrightam had never written again, except through her lawyer, to institute divorce proceedings. The matter had caused Wrightam crucifixion. Into the secret chamber of his communion with his Lord he had carried this burden also, and brought the assurance of help. Under the State law he could not prevent the appeal nor the final decree. There was, however, a period of three months remaining before the divorce could be obtained. He had noticed in the paper that day a theatrical notice of Mrs. Lynde's acting in a sensational play. She had taken her old name, and, according to the press reports, was winning ovations everywhere. Wrightam had written her to her address in the town where she was last with her company, begging her to return home, telling her of Eileen's devotion, and also giving her an account of his financial losses. He had closed his letter by saying to her:

"Amy, I am obliged to give up the house and its furnishings, except what is necessary for Eileen and myself, and for you, if you will come back. I have not time to tell you the reason for all this. I am at peace with God and have a clear conscience. It will be a cross for Eileen to leave the house. I have not yet spoken to her about it, but expect to do so to-night. She has been a true daughter, and I am sure of her loyalty. But oh, Amy, my wife, the past will be as if it had never been if you will only return, and with Eileen and Alfred, who I learn is with you still, start a home life with love at the heart of it and a great forgiving God to shed his mercy over us. My prayer, as I write this, is that you may come. God help us."

The writing of this letter was fresh in his mind as he let Eileen take his coat and hat. He bent down and kissed her, and after chatting a few moments in the "den" they went out to supper.

When the meal was over they went back into the "den." The familiar room had become the regular sitting-room of the house, dear to father and daughte on account of its associations.

"Eileen," Wrightam began, following an old habi contracted in his previously crowded business career "what would you think of moving away from Lenox?'

"Why, father, I have never given it a thought What do you mean?"

"What would you say, girl, if your father should tel you he must let this house go and move into a far less expensive one?"

The girl's naturally unchecked extravagant tastes rose up to rebel.

"You don't mean, father, that you are not able——"

He feared, for one bitter moment, that she was going out of his life as her mother had gone. But he went on calmly to tell her the unwelcome truth.

"Eileen, my fortune is gone. The house that has sheltered us is no longer rightly mine. I have a piece of unencumbered property in Brandon, with a comfortable house, where we can go and make our home. But we shall have to give this up. Do you realize, girl, that your father is no longer a rich man? I have talked with you about this matter a little. It is hard for you to understand it. I am sorry for you, Eileen."

She looked at him more thoughtfully. The marks of struggle he had made for over a year were plainly indicated in his face and figure. But there was no mark of defeat. It was all stamped with the victory, not the humiliation, of the Cross. But the greatest thing Eileen saw to-night was a wistful yearning for sympathy and affection. She saw he needed assurance of her willingness to share with him the new and probably strange life now awaiting them. She hesitated only a moment. Next instant, her arms were around his neck, and she was crying a few natural tears of regret at the earthly loss of the things she had prized; but he knew, as he proudly stroked her hair, he was a richer man than he had ever been; for this which he now possessed was worth more than all the money he had ever called his own.

Later in the evening, after they had discussed freely their plans, Eileen suddenly asked, "Father, isn't Brandon the place where Harvey has begun his experiment with the new mill company?"

"Yes, the mill has been running for four months now."

"Are you thinking of going into that—into the business there?"

Wrightam smiled, "I have not been asked to take a position. Harvey is having all sorts of trouble. Mr Stanton told me to-day that matters were in confusion. They have a fine plant, and Harvey succeeded in getting interested over six thousand men in his scheme. But as you know, Commings and Fleming have more than held their own here, and it looks like a battle between the same old forces, and I doubt if Harvey has the administrative and organizing ability to win out."

Wrightam's eyes flashed with the old war spirit of the commercial days, when he was the leader in gigantic efforts to control the market. Perhaps even then he had some vision of what his own Master could do with his regenerated powers. Surely, they had been given him for some great purpose. He brooded over the matter, and in the weeks that now followed, while busy with the details of his removal to Brandon, he was praying for guidance and wisdom from that source which he had come to regard as infallible.

He had been settled in Brandon only a few days, and was still without any definite plans for his future, when, going out one afternoon with the intention of visiting the new mills that stretched along the river, their tall chimney streaming with smoke and the shorter one spouting flame, he encountered Arthur Harwood, just entering one of the company offices.

"What! Arthur! You here?"

"Yes, I'm foreman of the new model-room. I finished at Amherst last June, took a summer course in mechanical engineering at Waldeck, and then came over here and applied for a place."

He spoke earnestly, but gravely. Wrightam admired the young man's appearance immensely, and asked him home to dinner that evening. He came, and after the meal the two men spent the evening talking over the situation of the Brandon mills. Eileen, who was keeping house for her father, and blossoming into a most charming housekeeper, was an interested listener. Young Harwood defined the situation in a sentence.

"Harvey thinks he knows it all. He has wonderful qualities, but I believe this task is too much for him. He has some fine foremen. They understand their departments, but can't go outside of them. The general management is ineffective. The co-operative plan promises all right. The men do not complain much. But the whole thing lacks a head. Then, besides all this, Harvey, with all his executive ability and his real desire to bring about the Brotherhood, has no use for the religious factor. To my mind, he invites defeat by ignoring this great essential. All he is after is the loaves and fishes. And I predict defeat even in that line, because he leaves out the most essential thing of all."

Wrightam nodded vigorous assent. "I believe with you, Arthur. What can be done? It would be a pity to have all this thing go to the wall."

"I am only a kind of experimenter," Harwood answered with a sigh. "I can only be counted a drop in the bucket. I have my work to learn. And I have absolutely no influence with Harvey in such a matter."

"The possibilities here are wonderful!" Wrightam muttered. The sight of the great chimneys, the hum and whirr and stir of the mighty plant, as he caught them during his already brief stay in Brandon, had affected him strongly. The knowledge of his own powers, directed as they now were, along the way to the Kingdom, excited in him such ambitions as he had never known.

Yet he hesitated to go to Harvey with any proposition or proffer of counsel, or even an application for a position. Somehow, it seemed to him the way was going to open for him in God's good time, and when it came it would be exactly what he wanted.

During the evening Eileen played and sang, and Harwood sang one selection with her. They had been acquainted in the days before Arthur had gone away to college, but had not seen each other much, as they had not moved in the same circle of social life. Harwood regarded Eileen with respectful curiosity, having heard the story of her devotion to her father. Eileen regarded him with interest, knowing something of his plan, as he suggested it that evening, to do as his own father had done in an attempt to study at first hand the conditions of Labor. When Harwood went back to his boarding place that night he carried with him a pleasant picture of Eileen and her father standing together in the hall, heartily inviting him to drop in often of an evening.

Before all that became a part of this history, however, an event occurred that led to the opening of the door Wrightam was praying for; but it came along a mysterious track that he had never dreamed, and in a way that he would not have chosen. But God's ways are not ours, and his dealings with the children of men are past finding out.

"DURING THE EVENING EILEEN PLAYED AND SANG"

It was less than a week after Harwood had been to Wrightam's that evening, that Wrightam, walking down by the mills, fascinated and attracted in that direction, noticed, staring at him on a high board fence across the street, a theatrical poster, announcing the coming of "Mrs. Elsie Lynde, the great melodramatic actress," to Brandon, in her famous play, "The Last Act."

He stared at the many-colored poster, which contained a large picture of his wife, and on his way back home hoped that Eileen would not see it. But when the papers that week gave large notices of Mrs. Lynde's play, and sensational accounts of herself, Wrightam knew Eileen must have knowledge of her mother's coming to Brandon. The girl had not mentioned it to him, but he noted an increase of tenderness in her manner towards him.

WHEN you think of book cases, you naturally think of GLOBE-WERNICKE. There are a good many logical reasons why this is true, and we would like to explain to you just why you should cling to first impressions and buy Globe-Wernicke book cases.

We make more book cases than all our competitors combined. The magnitude of the business closely affects the product. A big, prosperous business means economy in the buying of materials. It also means first choice in materials.

We select the finest woods that can be found, and because our purchases are large, the price is low. We employ none but the most skilled workmen, and our equipment is the best that money can provide.

The finished product embodies the best materials, workmanship and finish, and every book case we make is equipped with a door equalizer that is an absolute surety against binding, so that every section is as near perfection as human effort can make it.

It fits itself, and all other Globe-Wernicke cases of its class with which you may use it in the future. Another thing of importance is that our standing, our commercial rating and the magnitude of our business insures permanency.

When you wish to add additional book cases next year, or in ten or twenty years from now, the Globe-Wernicke product will be ready for you.

As to price, we fix that. No goods of quality can be sold at lower prices than we make, and no manufacturer trifles with the prices we have set. Thus we protect you as to quality, as to assurances of the future and as to price.

You do not have to pay the freight, and if one of our agents is near you, the book case will be delivered and set up free of charge. Write for our catalog Z-101, and list of agents.

OBI WORSHIP IN JAMAICA

the chiefs of the tribe. In the settlement the women were doing all the work, and polygamous wives were numerous; but here there was a school conducted by a young mulatto woman, who had been trained at one of the charity schools in Kingston. "I am a Maroon myself," she said; "otherwise these children would not be permitted to learn to read and write under my instruction." Such were these warlike people, half civilized, living in what is, too truly, Darkest Jamaica.

Among the vast negro population, the most pernicious influence against which the church in Jamaica has to work is Obiism or Voodooism. The church has labored against this worship of Obi, the God of witchcraft, for many years, but has not yet found a way to keep it in check. Until Obiism is entirely wiped out, the saving of Jamaica cannot be accomplished.

One morning I read these headlines in the local newspaper: "Cruel Butchery, Result of Obiism." I had never seen the word before, and I asked my friend, the doctor, what it meant. "An Obi-man or Obi-woman," he said, "is one versed in magical arts, or witchcraft. Obiism has its corresponding superstitions among negroes in all parts of the West Indies."

The newspaper paragraph containing the story of the "Cruel Butchery," told of the murder of a child; and went on to relate how the authorities had discovered that the murder was nothing less than a human sacrifice to the Obi; an Obi-man himself working upon the superstitious fears of the parents, until, in a very frenzy of fright, they had boiled the child alive. "Come over to Spanish-Town," said the doctor, "and we will see the murderers, who are locked up there."

Spanish-Town, the former capital of the island, is half an hour's ride on the railway from Kingston. The keeper of the jail, himself a black man, showed us all over the plantation, upon which the prisoners are made to work. Among the workers was the father and mother who had submitted to the Obi-man. "But where is the Obi-man himself?" we asked. "Surely he is the man to be punished most severely." "That's just the trouble," said the jailer. "The parent here will not reveal the name of the Obi-man, nor will any one in the village from which they come give us the slightest clue, even though we offer a large reward. It has always been so."

It seems that either a man or a woman may pretend to be specially favored by Obi, and thus are Obeah. After working themselves into the proper frame of mind by a course of fanatical actions, they then proclaim that they possess magical powers, and are what are known to the whites as witches. The part is played usually by an old and crafty black man, who knows how to prey upon the weakness and credulity of his people. His forbidding aspect helps him to gain his place in the imagination of the ignorant; and he further qualifies for the imposition by pretending to possess great skill in plants of the poisonous and medical varieties. The villagers revere and fear him, and, above all else, consult him, for which consultations the Obi-man charges enough in fees to support him. It is only when he thinks his power or influence is growing weak, that he calls upon his people for a human sacrifice. Meanwhile he poses as an oracle; and his people place the most implicit faith in him. He advises how to cure diseases, tells how to obtain revenge for injuries, and predicts the future.

But, notwithstanding Obiism, infidelity and immorality, and the example of the unconquerable Maroons, church workers in Jamaica are firm in the belief that there is a future for the negroes of the island, and that the black people still are capable of enlightenment. The saving of Jamaica is not now dependent upon commerce, but upon those self-sacrificing Christian workers who are willing to labor in this tropical vineyard.

Various agencies are now at work in the saving of Jamaica. The educational facilities include over 700 schools and colleges, with 90,000 scholars. Although only 200,000 out of a population of 800,000 can read and write, still education is making rapid progress. All over the island there are free schools, not included in the regular system, which are supported by individual planters, for the education of the children of their workmen. Then, too, every town of any size has its training and industrial school. In Kingston, I visited a splendid building, in which is housed the Theological College of Jamaica. About a thousand churches and missions are working hard to bring the natives to Christ. In addition, there are at least thirty important charitable institutions. Notable among these is Lady Mico's charity for the education and training of black and colored children, and the training of teachers for schools of all Christian denominations. This charity is supported by a fund of $600,000. There is also the Merrick charity, for the support of indigent colored and black people, where boys and girls are trained to become self-supporting. Moreover, there is the Belmont Orphanage and Industrial School, where orphans and destitute children are given a comfortable home and taught a useful trade. Among missionary societies, perhaps the largest and most active is that of the Baptist Church of Jamaica, which is doing a most excellent work. GILSON WILLETS.

Moslems at Their Devotions

TO travelers in the picturesque Balkans, the scene represented in the illustration is by no means unfamiliar. At the railway stations on the way to Mostar-Sarajewo, in the Valley of the Narenta and elsewhere, one sees just such incidents. The train stops a while, the sun is setting, and it is time for the orthodox Mohammedans to have prayer. Some aged Turks, with great dignity, get out of a wagon, spread their prayer-carpet on the ground, and say their prayers with the customary ceremony. Behind them there are already others waiting, who may not have a prayer-carpet of their own, and yet who do not wish the opportunity for devotions to pass unimproved. They take off their pointed shoes before kneeling, as it is not permitted to walk on a prayer-carpet with shoes on.

MOSLEMS PRAYING AT A RAILWAY STATION

At these out-of-the-way places in the Balkans, one meets all kinds of people. Here are farmers from the high mountains, wrapped in their woolen mantles, with big hoods; wood-choppers, known by their immense axes; slender Herzegovinians, who, in dress and looks resemble the Montenegrins; also women from Servia, Bosnia and Turkey; the last, deeply veiled, but all with wide silk trousers instead of skirts; inquisitive children, little girls with reddish hair, and pale, fine faces, whose caps and bodices are trimmed with coins. But there are few among them that hold the attention of the traveler so thoroughly as do the devout Moslems, who, however mistaken they may be in their belief, have at least the merit of a consistent observance of their religious principles.

A Great Poet's Namesake

"WHERE we write 'Ended,' angels write 'Begun.'" After a busy, useful and honored life, William Cullen Bryant, for thirty years associated with the Brooklyn Daily Times, passed away on Wednesday, Feb. 15, in Plainfield, N. J. He was business manager of that publication, and one of the best-known and well-liked men in the journalistic profession throughout the United States.

THE LATE WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT

Mr. Bryant was a distant relative of the famous poet of the same name. His father was the poet's fourth cousin, and so closely resembled his illustrious relative that he was frequently mistaken for him. But Mr. Bryant never cared to parade the fact that he was a namesake, preferring to stand on his own merits. His library contained many of the poet's works. He was born in New York City, August 1, 1849, but spent the early years of his life in Brooklyn, and upon his father's farm in Connecticut, which lay midway between Derby and Bridgeport.

After some years spent in mercantile life, he began his newspaper career in 1875, becoming associated with his father-in-law, the late Bernard Peters, in the publication of the Brooklyn Times. On Oct. 5, 1875, he married Mr. Peters' oldest daughter, Julia M. Mr. Bryant was one of the founders of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, and three years ago he was made Treasurer of the Publishers' Press Association. He had also served for many years as Secretary of the Local Publishers' Association in New York City.

In social and public life in Brooklyn, Mr. Bryant always took a very active part. At one time he served the city as Fire Commissioner, and on various occasions the popularity and esteem in which he was held by all who knew him, were made strikingly manifest. He is survived by five children: William Bernard Bryant, Mortimer D. Bryant, Miss Camilla L. Bryant, and two minor children, Thomas A., and Julia Bryant.

Mr. Bryant's devotion to his sick wife during her long illness, broke his own health and hastened his death.

Mr. Bryant was a Christian of the unostentatious kind, and loved to do good in secret. He was a member of All Souls' Church, Brooklyn, and its pastor, Rev. L. Ward Brigham, officiated at the funeral. All who were fortunate in knowing Mr. Bryant as a friend, will fully appreciate the words of one of his trusted employees: "I have found him a man worthy of the reputation he has so grandly left behind."

A Timely Gift to Charity

Miss Evangeline Booth and her associate workers in the Salvation Army, who recently opened a number of relief stations in New York City, for supplying food to as many as possible of the great army of 70,000 children, who, according to Mr. Robert Hunter, went to school hungry every morning, were gladdened a few days ago by the receipt of a letter from the Postum Cereal Company, of Battle Creek, Mich., announcing a gift by Mr. Post of "5,000 pounds of Postum Cereal." This most timely contribution to the resources of the Salvation Army in this branch of its work, is greatly appreciated. The Postum Cereal is now generally admitted to be far healthier, more nourishing, and more desirable than ordinary coffee for most people, and especially for children. It is easily prepared, according to simple directions. The Salvation Army is now supplying it at all the "Children's Breakfast" Stations with entire satisfaction. This is the most valuable contribution to the work thus far received.

Railway Rebates and Rates

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

THE editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has asked me to tell its readers something about the railway legislation which is before Congress, and which, perhaps, is the leading subject in the minds of the American people. It is a big subject, but it is not too big to be understood. One way or another, it affects everybody in the United States. For instance: the cost of moving the crops produced in 1904 is between $450,000,000 and $475,000,000. The farmers who produce these crops, the mechanics, and clerks, and other classes who consume them, the million employees of the railways, and the several hundred thousand stockholders and bondholders who receive their incomes from railway investments, are all interested.

The extent of the railway freight business as related to the crops, may be better understood by stating, that if the wheat, corn, oats, hay and the like, which were produced in 1904, were all moved at once, it would take 5,400,000 cars. The corn crop alone would require 60,000 freight trains of forty cars each to move it. The corn crib of the United States in 1904 was one of the biggest ever known.

It is now nearly twenty years since Congress undertook to regulate the railways. Under the Constitution it had no authority over the lines which began and ended within the limits of a single State, but it could exercise authority over those which ran through more than one State. The Interstate Commerce law, which was chiefly the work of Senator Cullom of Illinois, was passed in 1887. It provided for a somewhat vague oversight of the railways, and created a body known as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Some good was had from this Interstate Commerce law, but after several years it was found that a new evil was growing up, which neither the law nor the Interstate Commission was able to meet. This was the granting rebates by the railways.

The real meaning of the railway rebate is, that it favors one shipper at the expense of another, and enables the big fellow to crush the little one. It is not only stifling competition—it drives the small shipper out of business. Many examples of this favoritism have been shown. In Iowa, three men were engaged in raising hogs for the Chicago market. The one who had the most capital wanted the other two to sell their hogs to him. They would not do this; but they found that they could not market them with profit in Chicago, because the freight rates took all the profit away from them. Yet the big shipper was marketing his hogs and making money. Apparently he paid the railways the same freight as the two smaller shippers. Actually he got back from the railroads, in the shape of rebates, part of what he paid. The result was, that after a time the two smaller shippers had to sell their hogs to the big shipper. This is a homely illustration, but it shows just how the rebate system works.

In the Indian Territory, two men were engaged in raising cattle. It would seem that each would ship by the nearest railway; instead, each one shipped by the railroad farthest away. The herds frequently met and passed each other. The reason was, that each of these cattle raisers happened to have influence with the railroad farthest from his ranches, and could get rebates. So, under this secret arrangement, the cattle were driven to the farthest, instead of the nearest railroad.

The methods of granting the rebates were various. Some of the big shippers would be carried on the pay-rolls of the railway companies as messengers, clerks and other employees, at enormous salaries. Of course these salaries were simply the difference between the freight which they paid the railways, and the amount which, by secret agreement, was to be refunded them. Sometimes, also, the rebates were paid by means of false claims and fictitious vouchers. The whole system was a cheat. It was un-American and it was contrary to the spirit of fair play. It meant that the small shipper was at the mercy of the railways and his big competitors. The railways claimed that they were driven to the system by self-defence. If they did not practice it, they said, they would lose business, and they gave many instances in which the big shippers refused freight unless rebates were granted.

Congress, by various laws, undertook to remedy this condition. It was found that so long as railway employees and officials were liable to criminal prosecution, evidence could not be had. So the law finally was amended, and by what is known as the Elkins Act, criminal prosecution was omitted. Instead, both shippers and common carriers who offer or receive rebates, concessions or discriminations, are guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine not less than $1,000, nor more than $20,000.

The claim is made that this law is now being strictly observed, and that the whole odious system of rebates is being done away with. The railways profess that they are benefited by the law, and are anxious to see that all its provisions are complied with. They also claim, that since the chief grievance of the people was this rebate system, there is no need for further legislation now that it is disappearing.

President Roosevelt has taken issue with the railway managers on this point. In a general way, he has recommended that the rates be regulated. To this recommendation the railroad interests object very strongly. They claim that for one thing it means that the government virtually takes possession of private property. They also assert the making of rates is so complicated and so delicate, that if it is to be attempted by government officials, unskilled in the business, there will be endless confusion and loss all around. Their views have been stated for them by Mr. Samuel Spencer, the president of several important companies. They declare they agree with the President that the highways of transportation must be kept open to all upon equal terms. But the President clearly thinks that the regulation of rates is one way to do this. The railroad interests think otherwise. This is the nub of the whole controversy.

The Kentucky Mountaineers

ONE of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. J. S. Davidson, of Fayetteville, Ark., sends us a letter describing social conditions in the mountains of Kentucky, and stating his appreciation of the work that is being carried on there. He says:

"I read an article in your paper of January 25, from the pen of Dr. Miles Saunders, Buckhorn, Ky., which made my heart leap for joy. I know something of that country and the conditions which have existed there for many years; and I also know that no more worthy effort could be made in any land than to try to lead those people onward and upward to a higher and better life.

"Thirty years ago, I first saw the light of this world in a little log hut, which nestled down among the mountains of the Whoop-for-Larrie range, in Owesley County, Ky., and near the very bluff under which some old-time hunters were camped one night when, as the story runs, they heard a terrible racket, as if a large wagon were being run over the hills, and a voice hollering, 'Whoop-for-Larrie! Whoop-for-Larrie! Whoop-for-Larrie!' whereupon they all ran off, except one old man, who was too badly crippled to move, and had to stay until the unwelcome sound ceased and the other hunters returned to the camp fire.

"My father was born and raised in that country, as were, also, my grandfather and grandmother, but the conditions always seemed to be growing worse. So, in the spring of 1880, when I was only six years old, my father and grandfather sold their little homes there, and emigrated to the mountains of Arkansas, where I grew to manhood. On May 29, 1889, my father died in the triumphs of a living faith, and I have tried since that time to live a Christian life.

"Let the good work of saving souls go on in the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee, West Virginia and the Carolinas until every hill and vale shall echo the praises of our blessed Saviour's name."

The Sinner's Friend

By MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER Jesus had spoken of the Holy Spirit as the "living water," (John 7: 37-39), he had gone to the Mount of Olives, no doubt for uninterrupted com-muning with his Father. Early in the morning he came again into the temple, and taught, and many were there to hear him. The Pharisees, always on the watch to bring about some ground of accusation against Jesus, brought to him a sinful woman to ask his opinion on her case. "Master," they say, "Moses in the law commanded us that such should be stoned; but what sayest thou?" If they could establish an instance of his counseling disobedience, they could have an indict-ment against him. In their wicked hearts was no grief for the woman's sin; God's glory did not count with them; there was no compassion for the woman's soul. All they wanted was for their plot to succeed, that they might get rid of him, whose pres-ence and teaching were a constant rebuke to them. When he turned away, and "with his finger wrote upon the ground," they continued their inquiry, they would not be ignored.

There was in the law, not only the com-mand that such sinners as this woman should be stoned; there was also, in the case of an execution, a law providing whose hand should be the first to inflict the penalty (Deut. 17: 7). And in accord-ance with this law, Jesus said: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." And instead of succeeding in convicting him, these his wicked accusers were convicted. "They who heard it, being convicted by their own conscience, went out one by one, beginning at the eldest, even unto the last; and Jesus was left alone, and the woman standing in the midst."

But these sinners were unwillingly con-victed, unwillingly conquered, their hearts were not won, and they were still slaves of sin. From them he turned to the woman: "Where are those thine accusers? Hath no man condemned thee?" "No man, Lord." But there was no word of excuse or of self-justification, and this woman, in her shame, was nearer to the holy Son of God than the self-righteous men who had accused her, and sought to entrap him. And he who alone had the right to stone her, he the sinless One, who was about to bear her sin, said with the authority of a Redeemer: "Neither do I condemn thee; go, and sin no more." And the woman was a slave no longer. Sin's condemnation and power alike were broken.

Again, therefore, i. e., in connection with this incident, Jesus asserted, "I am the Light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." The sinful woman was in the light, she had followed him; but his accusers walked in darkness still. Again the Pharisees bring up the accusation: "Thou bearest witness of thyself," although he had proved that four other witnesses had testified to him (John 5: 35-39, R.V.) And now he speaks with the utmost bold-ness, so that there could be no mistake as to his claim to be the Messiah, Emmanuel. "Ye judge after the flesh; I judge no man, yet if I judge, my judgment is true; for I am not alone, but I and the Father which sent me. . . . I am One that bear witness of myself, and the Father that sent me beareth witness of me." And then, in answer to the question, "Where is thy father?" "Ye neither know me nor my Father; if ye had known me, ye should have known my Father also. . . . I am from above, ye are from beneath; ye are of this world, I am not of this world."

But the Pharisees heard as though they heard not, and while the impotent man was walking about healed, and the woman taken in adultery was become a changed woman, no change had taken place in these Pharisees. Why? Because they would not face the question about their sins. There is no way of getting at God independently of the great question of sin and forgive-ness. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me" (John 14: 6). "I go my way," said the Lord. How little they knew all that was meant in this. They thought that they would get rid of Jesus when they had hunted him to the Cross. But in the holy dignity of his great purpose to redeem a world, he calls the Cross "My way," for he laid down his life of himself, and the re-surrection, and ascension, "My way," for he took back his life of himself.

The FELS-NAPTHA News

WAR!

GREAT VICTORY FOR GENERAL INTELLIGENCE

Mistaken Ideas Have to Sur-render to Facts and Commonsense

The women of America bought many million cakes of Fels-Naptha Soap dur-ing the past year.

This shows how true it is that Fels-Naptha Soap, without hot water or hard labor, gets the clothes cleaner and whiter than any other soap gets them, even with the hardest kind of rubbing and boiling added.

It shows that women have found out how Fels-Naptha gets at the dirt and loosens it without ever hurting the clothes.

That's a great vic-tory for common-sense and reason.

LATEST DISPATCHES

The "News" special corre-spondent cables that after des-perate and unavailing assaults by common soaps, the last spot of dirt was easily chased out of a delicate colored wash in half an hour by

Fashions

Old style wash-day Now out of date

Bright women of the day find that hard rubbing in the wash soon wears their clothes to pieces.

They find that Fels-Naptha soap brings the clothes out white and sweet and snowy, without the severe rubbing or any boiling whatever.

"It has a peculiar power."
"It quickly loosens dirt."
"But has no effect on the fabric, not even the most delicate weave."
"Wonderful, but true."

Thousands of women have proved it.

Directions on wrapper.

Politics

Big Reform wave sweeping over the country.

No more ruthless over-tax-ing of women's strength and patience.

Sensible women have voted to "turn these rascals out:" Dirt. Backache. Suds-Steam.

They've got to go.

Fels-Naptha Soap is win-ning the campaign for a rea-sonable, modern wash-day, with comfort and economy.

Sensational Divorce

A Philadelphia woman reports that an absolute separation of all the dirt from an extra large wash was granted last Monday in her home in less than half a day.

This is record time in that family.

It's an open secret that

FELS-NAPTHA caused it.

The woman says—
"Glad of it."
"Best thing ever hap-pened!"

Double Tragedy!

Masked Robber Named Over-work

Enters Many Homes Before Daylight—Murders Sleep and Inflicts Severe Injury on the Whole Family.

Some women don't realize how much harm is done by the long hard work of a common wash-day with or-dinary soap and the scrub-bing, scalding and steaming that go with it.

Perhaps they put it through with a rush and think it's done and over with in another day. But it isn't.

"Not by any means."

"That needless, slavish work takes it out of their flesh and blood."

"Robs them of their health!"

"Steals away their best energy and youth and life!"

And you don't get the clothes as clean as you would with Fels-Naptha without this useless labor and discomfort.

Better save health, strength and clothes. Ask your grocer for Fels-Naptha Soap, or write for free sam-ple cake. Do it today.

DAZED WITH JOY

A man was discovered stand-ing on the corner of Chestnut and Broad Streets Monday, fairly dazed with joy. On being questioned he said his wife had used Fels-Naptha Soap, finished the washing by noon, and, for the first time in years, sat down to a square meal with him on wash-day.

Questions and Answers

M. C. What right has any one to alter the work of an author, by abridgement, or other means?

A publisher has no right to change an author's work in any important essential without his consent. Abridged editions are often published, with the fact so stated on the title page.

Old Reader, Metuchen, N. J. How old is Fanny Crosby? Does she still write hymns?

She will be eighty-five on March 24, and her friends throughout the country are arranging to make the occasion a very pleasant one for the dear old Christian poet, whose long and useful life has been devoted to giving the purest of pleasures to others. We believe she still writes hymns occasionally.

Miss M. L. B., Wesson, Miss. 1. What is the meaning of the word "mizpah"? 2. What is the meaning of the word "Croatan"?

1. "Mizpah" means "watch tower." 2. You probably mean "Croatian"—a native of Croatia, a province of the Austrian empire.

R. A., Archillian, Kans., writes apropos of our recent symposium on Unemployed Labor:

What a contrast to the conditions you are showing among idle but willing workers as you are showing them to exist in New York, and the scarcity of labor amid abundance of everything among us! I live in the St. Francis Basin, a country exceedingly fertile and well drained, but where labor is so scarce that you can hardly get enough wood cut, and much cotton will be ploughed under because it cannot be picked.

Minnie E. Lillie, Jackson, Minn., asks:

Can any reader inform me by whom the following lines were written, and where I can find them:

"All as God wills, who wisely heeds
To give or to withhold."

Perplexed, Muscatine, Ia. The Weather Bureau's work, and especially the "indications" or warnings it issues daily, are the means of averting much loss of life and property. It is in this sense a work of humanity or mercy, and is maintained by the government for the service of the whole people, and more especially of those engaged in agriculture, stock-raising, shipping, and other employments that expose them to the elements. We cannot regard this work in any other light than as a work of necessity and mercy. It is of the same character as the work of a lighthousekeeper, a railroad signalman, or a caretaker upon whose vigilance depend, not only the comfort and security, but often the very lives of others.

R. W., Philadelphia. Who was the author of the song:

This message, blessed Saviour, to her bear?

New York City. DR. SAMUEL G. TRACY.

J. B., Greenfield, O. 1. When and where was the first permanent newspaper published in the United States? 2. What is the oldest periodical in the world?

1. The first American newspaper appeared in Boston, Mass., in 1689, but, after running some time, it was suppressed by the government. 2. The oldest newspaper is the Pekin Gazette, which is said to be 1,200 years old. It gives no general news, and is in reality only a government bulletin. In ancient Rome, the government issued the Acta Diurna, or Acta Publica. This appeared daily, during the last years of the republic, throughout the empire. The contents consisted of an enumeration of the births and deaths in Rome, account of money paid into the public treasury, edicts of magistrates, wills of prominent men, reports of trials, and accounts of foreign wars, together with general news items and stories. The acta were not generally circulated, but posted in some public place. The modern newspaper traces back to both Germany and Venice. In the latter part of the fifteenth century, small sheets were published in Augsburg, Vienna, Ratisbon, and Nuremberg. In some numbers still in existence, may be found accounts of the discovery of America. In Venice, early in the sixteenth century, appeared the Nizie Scritte. These were posted in some place of public resort, and could be read on the payment of a coin called a gazeta, whence our modern name of "gazette." The first English newspaper, or, rather, newsletter, appeared in 1619, and was called News Out of Holland. The oldest English periodical still in existence is, we believe, the Gentlemen's Magazine, started in 1731. There is a legend that the first newspaper in France was published in 1631 by a physician, who distributed in this way the gossip he heard from his patients.

C. H. E., Lasalle, Ill. The Divine Omniscience does not conflict with man's freedom of choice and moral responsibility. If it did, such a condition would be fatalism.

Gertrude A. B., Braunhurst, Springfield, Ill. 1. Are the Japanese strict vegetarians? Do they eat any fish or flesh? 2. Is there at this time any renewal of litigation in the case of "Anneke Jans' Estate?"

1. The Japanese eat both meat and fish, the latter being a favorite food. 2. The climate of Japan varies. Riukiu and Bonin groups of islands, near the tropics, enjoy perpetual summer, while in the northern part of the empire, there is an arctic temperature. The weather is variable and changeable, but, on the whole, is favorable to Europeans. 3. Consult a lawyer about the Jans' matter.

E. C. M., Warren, Vt. When, where and by whom was the Youth's Companion started?

Established in Boston, Mass., by Perry Mason & Co., in 1827.

N. H. K., Germantown, Pa. There is an annotation by Dr. Christopher Witt in a "Breeches Bible" I have in my possession. It says: "It is affirmed that Herodias was crossing a body of water, on the ice, and the ice broke and she fell in up to her neck, and the ice came together again and cut off her head." Was there any body of water in that country which froze, or is it known if Herodias ever traveled where there was ice?

There is a monkish legend to that effect, but it has apparently no foundation. Josephus, in his Antiquities (Book 18, chap. 7, par. 2), states that she went into exile with Antipas, and remained with him (presumably in Spain), until her death.

C. C. Cary, Augusta, Ga., writes:

"In your issue of February 1, you state that Annie Louise Cary, the famous singer, is not related to the two sisters, Alice and Phebe Cary. Reference to the 'Cary Memorials,' gotten up by the late Hon. Samuel F. Cary, of Ohio, shows conclusively that all these noted ladies are descendants of John Cary, who came to America from England, about 1634, joining the Plymouth Colony. Alice and Phebe Cary are in the seventh generation, while Annie Louise Cary is in the eighth generation."

A. S. J. C. H. What is the meaning of the passage, "A day with the Lord is as a thousand years," etc.? (II. Peter 3: 8).

It means that time, as humanly measured, is as a drop in the limitless ocean of eternity. (See Psalm 90: 4). The Divine knowledge transcends all our measures of time. To God, future things are present. No delay is long to him, though to us, short-lived human beings, it may seem otherwise. The passage is an expressive figure of speech, not to be interpreted literally, but as showing the immeasurable vastness of eternity and the omniscience of God.

F. K. M. I have been repeatedly to the altar at revivals and each time have believed myself to be converted, yet afterwards I found no change in myself. I want to be a Christian: can you tell me the way?

There is but one way as, doubtless, you have been told many a time. That is to believe on Jesus. Perhaps you have been looking for extraordinary changes in yourself and have been ready to rely on those, if you had seen them, as evidences of conversion. That would have been a mistake. You are not to be saved by your feelings, but by Christ. He offers to save you; why not put yourself unreservedly in his hands and trust him to do it. If there is any sin you are clinging to, you must give it up. Ask him to make you all you should be. Tell him all that you have told us in your letter and beg him to give you a new heart. Think less of your own feelings, and try above everything to do all that he tells you to do in the Gospels. Trust him implicitly to save you, and believe firmly that he will keep his promise to cast out none who come to him.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Lowell, Mass. Why is the Apocrypha left out of the Bible?

It was omitted as uncanonical and of doubtful authenticity. This was the judgment of the great councils of the Church.

T. L. S., Eaton, N. Y. 1. What does Lent commemorate? 2. Why does it not begin on the same day of the month every year?

1. The fast is a preparation for the observance of Passion week and Easter. The solemn events of our Lord's trial, crucifixion and resurrection, have been commemorated by the Church in all times since their occurrence. In proportion to the ritualistic tendency of a church, the observance of Lent by its members has been regarded more or less as a duty. It is not enjoined in the New Testament, but is recommended by the churches as a suitable preparation. The duration of the fast of our Lord in the wilderness, of Elijah and of Moses, indicated forty days as the proper length of the observance. The Lord's Day, however, is not a day of fasting, so the six Sundays of Lent being omitted, Lent comprises forty-six days. This year, it begins on March 8, and continues until Easter Sunday, April 23. Its date is regulated, as was the Jewish Passover, by the phases of the moon, because it was at the Passover that Jesus was put to death. Easter Sunday is always the first Sunday after the first full-moon after the equinox, March 21. Reckoning backward forty-six days from that time in any year, you come to Ash Wednesday, which is the beginning of Lent.

J. H., Kalispel, Mont., and other inquirers. Why do we observe Sunday instead of Saturday, as the Sabbath?

We observe Sunday, not as the Sabbath, but as the Lord's Day, as we have repeatedly stated in these columns. We observe it in commemoration of Christ's resurrection, and the beginning of a new era. The Jewish Sabbath was a period of restriction and rest; the Christian holy day is one of spiritual activity. The resurrection of Christ was the keynote of Christianity, and as Paul said, "If he rose not, ye are yet in your sins." It was fitting that the church should observe a day so momentous in its history, and observe it in a way differing from the hard legal manner of the Jews. The people who are urging a return to the seventh day observance would, if they could, bring back the whole Jewish law which, as Peter said, was a burden neither they nor their fathers had been able to bear.

A. C. G., Pella, Ia. What necessity was there for revising the New Testament?

The chief advantage was that a better knowledge had been gained of the text since the King James translation had been made. Some of the expressions in that version had become obsolete. Also earlier copies of the book had been found which were more reliable. They did not change doctrines, but forms of expression. The book is of so intense importance that it was felt to be essential to have it absolutely accurate. In our Red Letter Bible, specimens are given of the changes that have been made, from which you will see how great is the improvement.

MISCELLANEOUS

Mrs. Susan H., Morrice, Mich. We have never heard of the verses you mention.

Mrs. M. E. R., Marion, Ia. The book is fiction, with a basis of historical fact.

M. P., Ionia, Mich. Write to Inquiry Bureau, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

Edw. M. H. Send them to the nearest hospital or mission, or to some prison chaplain, who will make good use of them.

Mrs. C. C., Kirkwood, Calif., asks some reader to send her a copy of the poem, entitled "What Shall Be My Angel Name?"

Mrs. L. B. S., East Orange, N. J., writes that Mrs. W. D. B., of Warren, Mass., can get the "Old Helmet" from DeWolf & Co., of Boston.

Old Subscriber, Ohio. We do not know who was the author of the lines quoted. It is not contained in any collection of poems which we have seen.

Mrs. J. H. Van Guysling, Voorhisville, R. F. D., N. Y., writes: "Will some reader send me the poem, the purport of which is that prayer is taking hold of the arm of God?"

T. H. S., Coatesville, Pa. Morning newspapers in our large cities go to press with their mail editions between 1 and 2 A. M., and with their local editions from one to two hours later.

R. McNulty, Norwich, Conn., writes that in response to his request in THE MAIL-BAG, he has received up to the present time over twenty copies of the poem, "The Christian Sailor." He heartily thanks the senders.

Reader, Homer, La. Palmistry is a pseudo-science, and is largely controlled by charlatans and so-called necromancers. We would advise you to place no dependence upon its teachings. "Professors" of the art, like fortune-tellers generally, live upon the credulity of other people.

Reader, Sheridan, Pa. 1. There are good plays and bad plays, but the influence of the theatre, as a whole, is such that it cannot be commended. 2. We see nothing wrong in attending a baseball game or any healthful outdoor recreation or exercise. Gambling on the result, and rough, brutal horseplay, however, should be avoided.

Jennie W. Stephenson, Gas City, Ind. Can any of your readers tell me who is the author of these lines:

"We're beaten back in many a fray,
Yet never strength we borrow;
Where our vanguard camped to-day
Our rear shall rest to-morrow?"

L. G. H., Shingle House, Pa. As a rule, adornment of jewelry, etc., may be classed as vanities, but there should be some discrimination. A watch, a wedding, a seal or a memorial ring, or even a medal given in recognition of real service, are not to be classed in the same category with the jewelry that is worn simply to gratify personal vanity and the love of display.

Helping the Ex-Prisoners

IN his report of the first month's work of the Prison-Gate Mission, the Superintendent, Chaplain J. J. Munro, gives a most encouraging account. Many ex-prisoners have been supplied with work. Mr. Munro says: "Every week, as I stand at the Prison Gate, I meet scores, sometimes hundreds of men, going forth to enjoy liberty again, to whom I speak words of encouragement and cheer.

"Some time ago, a farmer in a neighboring State saw in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an account of the Prison-Gate Mission's work, and wrote me that he could employ a man. From his letters, I concluded that he was a good Christian. I sent him a man who had been brought up on a farm. A few days ago, I received a letter from the farmer, thanking me. He wrote: 'Our man arrived all right. He seems to be very well pleased so far. He has promised to attend church with me.'"

The Prison-Gate Mission has applications from many who need shelter, food, and often clothing. Any contributions sent to Mr. Andrew A. Knowles, Treasurer of the Prison-Gate Mission, 33 Wall Street, New York City, will be promptly acknowledged.

THE MARDI GRAS.

Low-rate Tour to New Orleans via Pennsylvania Railroad.

For the especial benefit of those desiring to witness the unique Mardi Gras celebration at New Orleans, the Pennsylvania Railroad has arranged for a personally-conducted tour, to leave New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, Friday, March 3. A special train of high-class Pullman equipment will be run, in charge of a tourist agent. Three days will be devoted to New Orleans, the party returning direct to New York.

Tourists will occupy this train continuously, so that hotel accommodations and meals in New Orleans will not have to be considered. A special grand stand will be provided on the main line of the great parades. Round-trip rate, including round-trip transportation, Pullman berth in both directions and during stay in New Orleans, all meals in dining-car during entire trip, and seat in special grand stand at New Orleans: $75 from New York, $70 from Philadelphia, $65 from Baltimore, and $63 from Washington. Proportionate rates from other points. Detailed itineraries and full information may be obtained of Ticket Agents; C. Studds, Eastern Passenger Agent, 263 Fifth Avenue, New York City; or Geo. W. Boyd, General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sure Warmth

In hot air heating the heat is expected to "come up" through registers placed in the most protected part of the room. It has to be so "coaxed" in—especially on windy days. Stoves of course heat the rooms only in "spots."

In steam or hot water warming the heat is compelled to circulate through the hollow pipes and radiators, which are placed wherever warmth is most needed.

The Great Physician*

WHAT signs could Christ have given that he was a heaven-sent messenger, so appropriate to his character and work, as those of power over disease? When Moses was sent to the enslaved Israelites, he foresaw that the people would not believe that God had commissioned him, and he asked to be endowed with some supernatural power to enable him to win their confidence. His request was granted. It was not to excite their wonder, but that they might infer from his supernatural power that God was with him. Christ seems to have acted on the same principle. He was angry when the people treated him as a mere wonder-worker. His design in his miracles was to induce people to believe in his spiritual power. He would have them reason from the things they could see, to those that they could not see. That is, he would have them trust him as a Saviour. It was consistent with his sympathetic and compassionate nature that the majority of these supernatural acts should be miracles of healing. The feeding of the multitude implied his power to provide for his people; his calming of the storm implied his power to give spiritual peace; but in curing diseases he taught the chief lesson which he came to teach—his power to deliver men from every kind of evil.

Efforts have been made to explain away these miracles of healing but no satisfactory way of accounting for them, other than Christ's supernatural power has been found. They are precisely of the character that might have been expected of such a Being as he declared himself to be. There seems to have been no preparation, no theatrical display, but merely the exertion of the force that was within him on sufferers who came in his way. Sceptics have ridiculed the cure of demoniacs. They say that the idea of possession is a superstition of an ignorant age. But physicians who have had much to do with the insane are not so sure about it. Forms of insanity vary. In some the brain is actually diseased, but in others it seems to be morally unbalanced. In these latter cases, the sufferer displays a craft and cunning and a knowledge of circumstances which could not have been gained from his senses, that suggest demoniac possession. If such power over the human mind exists now and in the time of Christ, we can easily understand that a Being so pure and so mighty as he, could deliver the sufferer, as he is reported to have done. Such miracles would be consistent with his character.

One remarkable feature of these miracles of healing was the exercise of faith. In one instance, we read that Christ was actually unable to do mighty works because of the unbelief of the people (Matt. 13:58). In another case, faith wrought a cure of which Christ was unconscious until it had been effected (Mark 5:30). In the cure of the blind men (Mat. 8:28), Jesus asked for an expression of faith and made it the measure of the cure. "According to your faith." His power and belief in his power, worked together. This is the principle of salvation by faith. He is able to save, he offers salvation freely; but the only way in which a man can be saved, is by believing that Christ is able and willing to save him. In Christ there was unlimited power over sin and disease. His disciples reminded him, in the case already mentioned, how many had pressed upon him, but there was only one whose touch had drawn virtue from him. So it is with the mysterious spiritual life. Men hear about him and go their way, but the one who believes gets the blessing.

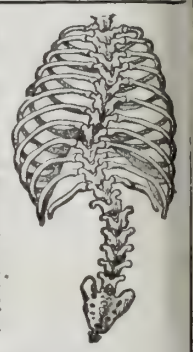
Crooked Spines Made Straight



If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of spinal curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the work being effected. Noted physicians in prominent medical institutions and in private practice are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebræ is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is straightened. There is a bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction, or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Write for our new book giving full information and references.

THE COLUMBUS CARRIAGE AND HARNESS CO., Columbus, Ohio.

It was before the day of SAPOLIO They used to say "Woman's Work is never Done."

A Whole Year for 10 Cents

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, of St. Louis, is now the greatest Magazine in the world, having One Million Five Hundred Thousand (1,500,000) subscribers, almost double the number of subscribers any other magazine or newspaper in the world has. Each issue is filled with splendid stories, beautiful engravings, special departments of Floriculture, Fancy-work, Fashions, Household, Health and Beauty, Poultry, Garden, etc.

There is a reason why THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE has more than double the number of subscribers that any other publication in the world has: if a reader of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE wishes to know anything about the latest styles, THAT month's issue gives them; if some bug is destroying her plants, THAT month's issue tells her what it is and how to get rid of it; if fruits are to be preserved, THAT month's issue tells all about them. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always tells its readers what they want to know at the right time. From 96 to 138 columns each issue of splendid pictures, interesting stories, useful information: Flowers, the Garden, Lace Making, Embroidery (with new and beautiful patterns each month that any woman can make), Cooking Recipes, Fashions, Poultry, Pets, Household Decoration, Pyrography, Curious Facts, Health and Beauty columns; each issue supplies reading for the whole family.

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE never permits misleading advertisements to appear in its columns and absolutely protects its readers so that they are not defrauded by catch-penny schemes. No whiskey or nasty medical ads. are ever seen in the columns of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. It is clean, wholesome and bright. A single issue is worth more than the whole year's subscription. We wish every home in America to receive THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and in order that it may go into your home, we will send you THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and if you do not like it after you have received it for three months, we will return your 10 cents and stop sending it. You will have had it three months for nothing. This shows very plainly that we know you will be pleased with THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. You will never be willing to discontinue it. In fact, we know you will be so delighted you will also get your friends to subscribe. No other magazine gives as much for five times the price we ask you.

Do not confuse THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE of St. Louis with the cheap, poorly printed and trashy story papers. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE is printed on fine paper, carefully edited and beautifully illustrated and is better than most Magazines sold for ten times the price at which we offer it to you. Our offer to refund your money if you do not like it after three months' trial is a guarantee that no other magazine ever dared to make.

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE

During the World's Fair, tens of thousands of our readers were taken care of by THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, in the great tent city "Camp Lewis," erected for our readers at a cost of over $30,000. The readers of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE know that every month they can expect some new and interesting feature.

The readers of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always know how to do things; their gardens and houses are the wonder of their neighbors, because it contains plain, easily understood articles, telling more good things about Flowers and the Garden than regular Floral Papers and are always seasonable. More good things about Fancy Work and Embroidery, with illustrated patterns, than Fashion Papers. More good things about Poultry and the Garden, and how to make money with them, than Poultry Papers. More good things about the Kitchen and Household than Household Papers.

HEALTH IN THE FOOD

Every one knows that Royal Baking Powder is absolutely pure. The housewife uses it with confidence, and she is justified in so doing.

But how few realize that Royal Baking Powder is a direct product of the healthful and delicious grape! The product of the grape, crystallized and ground, is the cream of tartar which forms the active principle of every pound of Royal Baking Powder.

Fruit properties are needful for the healthfulness of the body, and the grape as used in Royal Baking Powder is the most valuable and healthful of all.

Royal Baking Powder

produces food remarkable both in flavor and wholesomeness.

THE PRESIDENT AND MRS. ROOSEVELT LEAVING ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, WASHINGTON, AFTER SERVICE

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Mary B., Oberlin, O. 1. Where was the first woman's college founded, and who was its founder? 2. Where was the first college opened for co-education, and when was it opened?

1. The earliest institution was the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, South Hadley, Mass., and was founded in 1837 by Mary Lyon, who was its president until her death, in 1849. 2. Oberlin College, Ohio, founded in 1833.

C. F. M., Frewsburg, N. Y. Speaking broadly, all fairs, festivals, concerts, suppers, tableaux, plays and similar entertainments for the purpose of winning the heart and purse of the world, are out of place in God's house. "They are contrary to the precepts and examples of his Word and cannot be pleasing to Him," writes an authority. "They are counterfeit methods of giving, and they stimulate not genuine but bogus benevolence." Besides, to transform the church, which is consecrated and set apart for the Lord, into a restaurant, social parlor, festival hall or amateur theatre, is certainly desecration. See Lev. 19: 30; John 2: 14-17; Luke 19: 45, 46; I Cor. 11: 22.

Subscriber, Pleasant, Kan. On one of the recent covers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were the pictures of Grand Duke Michael, Grand Duke Alexis, Grand Duke Sergius, and Grand Duke Vladimir. How are they related?

The first is the grand-uncle of the present Emperor. The others are all brothers and uncles of the Emperor. There is another Grand Duke, Michael, younger brother of the Czar, but his picture did not appear on the cover and he is usually not included when we speak of the Grand Dukes, in a political sense, as the uncles are the more powerful.

S., Chillicothe, Mo. 1. What was the population of the United States by the last census? 2. What is the total number of representatives in Congress? 3. What is the present basis of apportionment to determine the number of representatives? 4. Is a representative in Congress a "civil officer?" If so, can he be impeached by the House, and tried by the Senate? 5. How much is the national debt? 6. What life of Christ is best adapted for reading by young people?

1. By the census of 1900, the population of the forty-five States and seven Territories was 76,303,387. This, of course, does not include Porto Rico or the Philippines. 2. The present number of Representatives is 386. 3. After the last census, the basis of apportionment was one representative for every 194,182 inhabitants. 4. A Member of Congress is not usually called a civil officer; he is more properly a legislative official. Congress makes its own rules, and either House may expel one of its members by a two-thirds vote. In case of one incurring the displeasure of the House, the only methods of punishment would be a vote of censure or expulsion, as mentioned above. 5. The outstanding principal of the Public Debt of the United States on Jan. 1, 1904, was $2,304,697,418.64. 6. The Story of the Gospel; or, Our Saviour's Life on Earth, by Charles Foster, price 50 cents, or, Life of Christ for the Young, by George L. Weed, price 60 cents. Thomas Whittaker, bookseller, Bible House, New York.

A. B. C., a Subscriber. Who was the first Pope of the Roman Catholic Church, and by what power or authority did he become Pope?

The title of Pope was for several centuries applied to all bishops of the church. It is generally believed that Bishop Siricus first used it in the fourth century. After the seventh century it was applied only to the bishops of Rome, and Gregory VII declared it to be reserved exclusively for them. The various titles of the Pope were gradually assumed as the power of the Papacy increased. They were not given by any body representing the members of the churches. For example, the early Popes called themselves "servants of God," then "vicars of Peter," and finally, "vicars of Christ."

Carrie M., Lynn, Mass. Where is the obelisk, called "Cleopatra's Needle?" Is it in London or New York?

Two obelisks—both called "Cleopatra's Needles"—were placed at the entrance of the Temple of the Sun, Heliopolis, Egypt, by Thothmes III., about 1831 B. C. In 1819, one of these obelisks was presented by the Egyptian Government to England, but it was not taken to London until 1878, owing to great difficulties in moving the "needle." Later, the other obelisk was presented to the United States, and is now in Central Park, New York.

C. D. F., Burlington, Vt. Will you please explain the significance of the term, "Poet Laureate?"

Poet Laureate is an office created by the sovereigns of Great Britain. The first appointment dates from the reign of Edward IV., the first patent being granted in 1630. It was formerly the duty of the poet laureate to write an ode on the birthday of the monarch, but this custom has been discontinued since the reign of George III. Among those who have held this office are Dryden, Southey, Wordsworth and Tennyson. The present incumbent is Alfred Austin.

E. V. C., Timberville, Va. 1. Is it wrong to run trains on Sundays to attend a religious meeting? 2. Is it wrong to drive horses to church on Sunday?

1. Not knowing the exact circumstances, we cannot give a positive reply. If there is any other way of reaching the place of meeting, and if the traveling can be done on a week-day instead, then it would be wrong to use the Sunday trains; but otherwise not. 2. Same answer applies to both. Such questions must be decided by the individual conscience, keeping in view the fact that works of necessity or of mercy, and no others, are justifiable on the Lord's Day.

A. H. A. J., New York. How many lawyers are there in New York City? How many of them are believed to be Christians?

It is estimated that there are about 12,000 practising lawyers in New York City. It would be impossible to ascertain their religious belief.

M. B., East Orange, N.J. Is a graduated physician, whose specialty is electricity, ever called an electrician, or is this word only applied to mechanics?

We see no reason why a physician, whatever his specialty may be, should be called by any other than his medical title. When we speak of an electrician, we mean one who is using his knowledge of electricity in connection with commercial pursuits. An electrician is not, strictly speaking, a mechanic; in late years he has been recognized as a professional.

Mrs. A. D. C., Trenton. We certainly should regard the playing of "coon" music and the reading of secular literature as Sunday desecration.

H. S. H., Dayton, O. Did the United States purchase the Danish West Indies? If so, when, and for how much?

No; a few years ago negotiations were opened with the Danish Government for the purchase of their possessions in the West Indies, but the legislature of Denmark refused to sell them. At the present time our government is in the position of an intending purchaser, should the islands be for sale. Denmark's West India Colony has an area of about 119 square miles.

X. Y. Z., Georgetown, N. J. 1. Is it a denial of Christ for a Christian to remain seated when all Christians are requested to stand; to stay back from the communion table in a sister church, and not go to the altar during a consecration service? 2. Is it right for a minister to decide when one should make a public confession?

1. We should be ready at all times to acknowledge our spiritual allegiance, yet there may be valid reasons why a person should do all that your letter says. We must not condemn others, lest by doing so in ignorance of the real nature of the case, we do a great injustice. 2. No, but he may help you in reaching the decision.

This verse of greeting from a local preacher (A. S. G.), Rockvale, Colo., breathes the spirit of good-will and appreciation:

THE HERALD dear is welcome here,
With its teachings, new and old:
It comes with its weekly words of cheer
For the young as well as the old.

H. J., Detroit, Mich. In a recent issue you say, under the caption "The Child Slave's Sad Lot," that over 500 illegal employers of child labor had been found. It seems to me that the enforcement of these Child Labor Laws is a physical impossibility. It would require too many new officials, and the certainty that they were all honest. In some localities it would need a change of sentiment, for in parts of Pennsylvania necessity has built up a body of public sentiment against Child Labor Laws. Is it wise to keep laws on the statute books which are impossible of enforcement?

The argument is fundamentally defective, for the reason that if you apply it to any other class of crime or misdemeanor that is unusually prevalent, you would have the same reason for concluding that because of that prevalence, the law was impossible of application. Power to prosecute violators of the Child Labor Laws is vested in the local courts, and the detection by any citizen of such violation, thould be reported in the usual way. All this, as you say, will be difficult, until popular interest is aroused on the subject. Then the laws will be easy enough of enforcement. Furthermore, it must be admitted that it is not always sickness or poverty, but too often sloth and indifference on the part of parents that force the tender little children to work, when they should be at school or at play.

Subscriber, U. S. A. In case no will is made, does a childless widow have the same property rights concerning the estate left by her husband as one who has children? Is this the same in all the States? Please explain the inheritance tax.

The laws regulating a widow's portion differ according to the State her husband lived in. Usually, she receives more if there are no children. A local lawyer should be consulted. The inheritance tax is a tax upon the value of property received from estate of a deceased person, either by intestacy or by will.

J. M., Allegheny, Pa. I have a class of boys, ranging from ten to twelve years, in the Sabbath School. I teach them from the regular lessons of the day. Should they not learn from the catechism a course of questions for each Sabbath, and what catechism (short or shorter) should they study? What is the best way to conduct such a class?

The brief time allotted to a Sunday School lesson is not sufficient to teach both the international lesson and the catechism. To try to do both will be like the greedy boy's effort to hold more apples than he could, with the result that he lost all. Parents put too much upon teachers, and should themselves be held responsible for the catechism, which cannot be properly taught except in daily brief portions. And the best catechism always is the one which gives its answers in Scripture language, rather than metaphysics, that even adults can seldom comprehend. Understanding first, then memorizing, should in all memory work be the rule. WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

J. F. B., Cologne, Va. What is the origin of the phrase, "Charity begins at home?" Is it in the Bible?

The literal phrase is not to be found in the Bible, but it is believed to be based on the passage in I. Tim., verse 4.

O. H. B., Northwood, N. Y. How was the Mormon prophet Joseph Smith killed—by a mob or by the law—and on what charge?

According to the accounts of eye-witnesses (as described by Burton, Mackay and others), Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum, were taken from the jail at Carthage, Ill., by a band of "200 roughs" (others say indignant citizens), June 27, 1844, and shot to death. The brothers were imprisoned under a writ issued by the Illinois courts, charging them with abetting the riot in which the offices of the Anti-Mormon paper, The Expositor, had been razed to the ground.

The question of the remarriage of persons, who have been legally divorced for some cause recognized by law as sufficient justification for a divorce, is one on which great diversity of opinion exists. It would be a great gain to civilization if human laws conformed to the teachings of Jesus Christ. But they do not, and yet good citizens must obey the laws as they find them. Christ himself taught this doctrine, though not so clearly and emphatically as St. Paul did. The questions asked by correspondent are to be settled by the individual conscience.

VENEZUELA'S SAD PLIGHT

INDUSTRIES STAGNANT, THE NATION RENT BY POLITICAL DISSENSIONS, AND CIVIL WAR A PROBABILITY

OUR readers may gain some light on the difficulties between our Government and that of Venezuela from the following letter, which is specially timely in view of the present crisis in e negotiations. The history of the trouble is typical Venezuelan affairs, as they have been managed since e death of Guzman Blanco, who ruled Venezuela for neteen years. It arose out of an appeal by the Berudez Asphalt Company to our Government for justice, hich it was unable to obtain in the Venezuelan courts. resident Castro controlled those courts, and influenced e decisions. Mr. Hay therefore proposed that the spute be submitted to arbitraon, and Senor Senabria, the enezuelan Minister of Forgn Affairs, consented. A proocol was drawn up, but before could be signed, President astro removed Senor Senabrai om office, and appointed Seor Ibarra in his place. He lso raised frivolous objections the protocol, and practically eclared that the United States ad no right to interfere in the ternal affairs of Venezuela. egotiations, however, were reumed; but before an agreeent could be reached, Presient Castro suddenly quitted aracas, and went on a junketng trip into the interior. He as now returned, but instead f resuming negotiations with Mr. Bowen, our minister to enezuela, he has sent a repesentative to Washington to eal with our Government. he precaution, however, has een taken of increasing our orce of warships in the Caribbean, in view of the ikelihood of force having to be employed.

VENEZUELAN TYPES—A STREET SCENE IN THE ANCIENT CAPITAL

THE CALM BEFORE THE STORM

From a Special Correspondent

In an article upon Caracas, which the writer contributed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several months ago, he expressed the hope that Venezuela might have a few years of peace in which to recover from the effects of the ten years of almost continuous strife from which she is suffering. It was, I fear, an idle hope, for though peace still nominally exists, it is the ominous calm that precedes the storm, rather than contentment and progress.

Caracas, to be sure, still shows signs of activity, but this is due to the military and political elements in the capital, and is much less noticeable in business circles than it was six months ago. Outside of the capital and one or two of the principal ports, however, the stagnation is so marked that one might suppose a revolution to be actually in progress or that a deadly epidemic was sweeping over the country.

Barquisimeto, for instance, a city of 50,000 inhabitants, transacts all its business with the outside world by means of a few freight trains and two passenger trains a week. Valencia, the third city of the republic, which is connected with Caracas by the famous German railroad, receives one train daily from the east. On the day I arrived, that train contained just two first-class passengers and half a dozen second-class. There is more traffic on the other railroad, which runs to Puerto Cabello; but even here, the conditions would astound a Northern railroad man unacquainted with Venezuelan affairs. Valencia is situated at the west of a large, fertile plain, and under a good government ought to be a prosperous and growing city. It is the natural market for the many coffee estates on the nearby hills, for the cattle upon the savannahs, and for cotton, sugar, maize, oranges, and a great variety of the fruits that grow in the neighborhood. Valencia is in this respect much better situated than Caracas; and though the latter has more important manufactures, it is because Caracas is the capital, and not because it enjoys superior advantages. Valencia, indeed, was the first capital of the republic, and even at the present day regards her more successful rival with some jealousy for having wrested the honor from her.

Approaching Valencia from the east, the passenger gazes upon leagues of dusty plain, broken here and there by a plantation or by a stretch of forest, the mountains everywhere in the background. Suddenly, however, the scene changes. Before him stretches a blue expanse of water, fringed with rice marches and low shrubbery. Then he remembers the strange lake that he has read of, the lake that mysteriously changes its level. Not only does this lake rise and fall without any apparent reason, but by so doing it has several times changed one of its outlets into a tributary, and has even changed an inlet into an outlet. For some years, the lake has been gradually falling, and parts of it are now said to be quite saline. Valencia does not overlook the lake, but is situated about two leagues from its western extremity; near enough, however, to enjoy a cooler atmosphere from its proximity. The city, like Caracas, is surrounded by high hills; but here, most of them are far distant. Unlike Caracas, Valencia has a healthful climate; and were it kept in a more sanitary condition, it ought to be one of the most healthful cities in the tropics. The streets are wide and fairly well paved, the houses are large and airy, gardens and plazas are numerous—many things struck me as being quite ideal. But the city is in the clutches of poverty. Owing to poor crops this season, and the low price of coffee, it has little to export, and owing to lack of money, it cannot import. Many of its petty manufactories have come to a standstill, and people everywhere are looking for work. Cases of actual starvation are said to have been found, and the strictest economy is being practiced by all classes.

Yet Valencia fares no worse than the country at large, which is being ruined and degraded by its political troubles. The only possible outcome of the situation, unless some foreign power should intervene, would seem to be another period of civil war, with a further sacrifice of life and the unspeakable misery and suffering that must result.

Venezuela is certainly in a most deplorable plight, and her future seems as dark as her past.

The TEST of COURAGE

TEXT: "I am ready to go with thee, both to prison and to death" Luke 22: 33.
"And Peter followed afar off" Luke 22: 54

I WANT to take this morning a double text. The first sentence is from the lips of St. Peter. Looking into the face of Jesus he says, "I am ready to go with thee, both to prison and to death." The second sentence is from the pen of Luke, "And Peter followed afar off." "I am ready to go with thee," that is what Peter said. "He followed afar off," that is what Peter did. The contrast between what a man says and what he does is a subject of large dimensions, and to this subject I invite your attention this morning.

See the contrast between those two faces! Peter is in the upper chamber. Jesus has been having a long conversation with his most intimate friends. He has told them that he is going away. Peter is filled with dismay. Jesus has told his friends that they cannot follow him. Peter wants to know why? He says, "I will follow you." Jesus keeps pushing him off, but Peter comes back with redoubled enthusiasm, saying, "I am ready to go with thee, to prison and to death. I will lay down my life for thee." Brave, noble, enthusiastic Peter! And now, who is that skulking down yonder street, slipping softly through the shadows, scared almost out of his wits lest some officer lay his hand upon him and carry him off to prison—without the slightest trace in his heart of any willingness to face death—who is that? That is Simon Peter, the man who said in the upper chamber, "I am ready to go with thee, both to prison and to death." The difference between the man in the upper chamber and the man in the street is our subject.

A Typical Character

I have called your attention to St. Peter, not because I care specially for him but because he is a specimen of human nature. He is like us, and we are like him. Looking into his face we can see a good image of ourselves. There is a vast difference between us in the upper chamber, and us in the street. No wonder Peter was brave in the upper chamber. Jesus had been talking for a long time; he had been dealing with the high things of the Spirit. He always touched the deepest springs in man's heart. The woman at the well expressed only what everybody who ever talked with him felt: "Here is a man who is telling me everything that I ever did." When he spoke, the man to whom he spoke felt ashamed of his evil conduct; he wanted to do better, and when Jesus held up the high ideals of feeling and thought, the angel of one's better nature came out and sang. As he had spoken on that evening the atmosphere grew strangely warm; it was glorious summer in the upper chamber, and aspirations and wishes, and dreams which had lain long in bud, burst into blossom, and the air was fragrant with holy desires and resolutions. The longer Jesus spoke the nobler Peter became. His heart went out to his friend in great tides of affection. Peter was never so completely himself as he was that night—affectionate, brave, true, ready to dare and to do anything for the sake of his friend. He was simply expressing the desire and intention of his deepest heart when he said: "I will go with you to prison and to death; I will lay down my life for you." But when he got down into the street, the atmosphere was different, the night air was chilly, the colors were all different, the world was drab. The ideals were different, they all were low; instead of looking into the faces of men who were turning toward the upper glories, he now looked into the faces of men who were sordid and selfish, and on worldly ends intent. The impressions of the street immediately attacked the impressions of the upper chamber, and the result was that Peter's courage oozed out, his heart sank, his enthusiasm cooled; in spite of his glowing promises he followed afar off.

That is our experience too. We have our upper chamber experiences. There are luminous hours when the soul expands. There are atmospheres in which all that is best in us bursts into bloom, it seems natural to be good; easy to be good; lovely to be good; and we are going to be good. Justice is beautiful, honesty is fine, truth is glorious, sacrifice is divine. Filled with the spirit we lift ourselves up and say: "I will be brave, and just, and merciful, and generous, and self-sacrificing. I will be the man that God would have me be." All that is said in the upper chamber. And then we come down into the street. And oh, the change! The cold wind blows in our face—the light that we had kindled in the upper chamber goes out. We were glowing, but in the atmosphere of the street the glow dies away; we are filled with dreams, but all at once we strike a stubborn fact, and are knocked all out of shape. So long as we face the ideal our soul sings, but the moment we collide with the actual, life takes on a different color, and the soul seems to be other than it was.

A Compromise

And yet even in the street we do not surrender altogether. That is one of the pathetic touches in the story of Peter's experience: he did not go back altogether. Why did he not get out of Jerusalem? Why did he not hurry northward to Galilee, away from the danger and away from Christ's foes, where he could lose himself among the friends of his youth? He would not do this; he could not do it. Not long before this he had said to Jesus: "Whither shall I go? thou hast the words of eternal life." Peter knew that his life depended on keeping within sight of Jesus; to turn completely away from him meant unspeakable desolation. He was afraid to keep close to him, he dared not wholly forsake him—and so he followed him afar off. That is our experience too. We will not give up righteousness altogether; we will not be an out and out rogue; we will not be as bad as we can be, we will not be selfish as the devil—but we will not be entirely truthful, nor altogether just, nor all the time kind; we will follow afar off. That is the pathos of history!

How are we to account for this difference in the man in the upper chamber and the man in the street? Why was it that Peter became a different man when he came down into the street? How can a man say: "I will follow you to prison and to death," and then follow afar off? The mystery, I think, can be explained. Between the declaration of Peter and the action of Peter there were several experiences which must not be lost sight of. There was an experience in Gethsemane, which, undoubtedly, had an effect on his heart. Jesus had taken his disciples to the gate of the garden where nine of them had been left. With Peter, James and John, he had gone into the garden, and having proceeded a little distance, he asked these three to remain where they were, while he went still deeper into the garden to pray. He was not a great distance removed from them, not so far but that Peter could see in the broken moonlight the dim outline of his form, not so far but that he could hear his sobbings and cryings. By this Peter was stupefied and dazed, he could not understand it. Jesus was the best man he had ever known, pure, brave, true. He had never done anything but good. He had been generous to the poor, and kind to the sick, and sympathetic with everybody. He was reverent, he loved God, his delight was to do God's will. And yet this man, good above all other men in Palestine, was wrestling in a great agony on the ground under the trees. It was a mystery which Peter's heart could not explain. It took out of him some of his strength. Having seen this, he was not so sure he could follow Jesus to prison and to death.

Depressed by Environment

We all have the same experience. In the upper chamber it is easy to believe in God: of course, he lives and loves and reigns; of course, the soul is immortal and in the Father's keeping; of course, God's eye is on all events and every life is in his hand. In the upper chamber all this seems clear and indisputable, but as soon as we get down into the street, what a spectacle is presented! everything topsy-turvy, lawless, chaotic—truth on the scaffold, wrong on the throne, innocence starved, justice outraged, truth derided, compassion scoffed at, virtue shoved into a corner, vice in silk, piety in rags. It is all so strange and unexpected and inexplicable that the heart is dazed. We stand stupefied, not knowing whether after all, what we saw in the upper chamber, is really true. Listen to the crying of the children, and the sobbings of the women, and the moaning of the men, and the deep and awful groan of our humanity sweating great drops of blood on the ground. No matter what a man may say in the upper cham[ber], he can never be the same man after he has seen [the] world travailing and groaning in pain.

To make the conquest of Peter's heart complete, [an]other disastrous event followed. Peter was not c[om]pletely prostrated by the tragedy of Gethsemane, [n]or was he altogether daunted by the lights and weapon[s o]f the crowd, there was still something of the spirit of [the] upper chamber in him, and he was ready to follow J[esus] even unto death. When he saw the officers coming [for]ward to lay their hands upon his friend his quick bl[ood] boiled, and drawing his sword, he slashed with all [his] might at the head of the man who happened to be n[ear]est to him. It was a wrong thing for him to do. [It] brought an instantaneous rebuke. In order to meet [the] power of Rome he would adopt the methods [of] Rome, to overcome Jerusalem he had made use of Je[ru]salem tactics. He did not know what spirit he was [of]. "Put up your sword." He did it, but from that m[o]ment he was a shamefaced and weakened man. He had wanted to do right; he had done his best to do [right] but in spite of all his good intentions he had blunde[red] and had brought down upon himself swift condemn[a]tion. There is nothing more disconcerting to a m[an] than to discover that he has blundered at a criti[cal] moment when he has been most conscientious and h[on]estly desiring to do the best and wisest thing. It sa[ps] his nerves and leaves him for awhile undone. One [of] the reasons why Peter followed afar off, was because [he] had blundered egregiously when he had been most e[n]thusiastic to do the thing which would win the Lor[d's] commendation.

Inevitable Blunders

That experience also is common to us all. No o[ne] begins the Christian life without making blunders, [no] matter how conscientious and no matter how carefu[l]. The best of people will do the thing and say the thi[ng] which is worst. For instance, a beginning Christia[n] says: "I am going to greet strangers in our church." He screws his courage to the sticking place. To spea[k] to some one he does not know is an ordeal simply awfu[l] but after prayer and the gathering together of all h[is] forces, he succeeds at last in speaking the welcomi[ng] word and putting out the welcoming hand; but in th[e] delivering of his message he says something which [is] injudicious, something which ought not to have bee[n] said to that particular person, and it brings down upo[n] his head a not altogether gracious reply. He steals o[ff] shamefaced and humiliated, and for many weeks he fo[l]lows duty afar off. The snap has been taken out o[f] him by his blunder. In order that he may not blunde[r] again, he will not do anything at all.

Or it may be he wants to bring somebody to God. He believes that this is his privilege and his duty. H[e] decides at last upon some one person to whom he wil[l] bring the message. He prays that he may have th[e] needed guidance and the needed strength. With trepi[da]tion he makes his way to the person, opens the con[ver]sation, presents his cause as ably as he can, but the result of all his labors is that the person is only offended by his officiousness and driven still farther away from the Kingdom. And the poor Christian, all crushed, goes out into the darkness, and while he does not give up Christ altogether, he follows him afar off. For a month he walks always down the shady side of the street, he avoids the sun because he does not want to be seen. He had expected to be a warrior in the forefront of the Lord's army, but now he goes to the rear, saying: "I want no prominent position, let me keep still and hide out of sight. Others may do the speaking and carry on the work!" And so because of these three reasons the streets are filled with Simon Peters, men and women following the Lord afar off.

Disastrous Experiences

How many thousands of them do you suppose pass up and down the avenues of this city every day, men and women who in the upper chamber of some country home, where the atmosphere was made warm by the summer which came up from Golgotha, made their vows and laid out their life plan and said in sincerity and truth: "I will follow thee, O Christ, both to prison and to death!" These men and women are now in this city, and overcome by its atmosphere, its pomp and displa its superficiality and its cynicism, its greed and its he lessness, its agony and its tragedy, they follow the Lo afar off. And in every church there are many wh do the same, some because they have been unsettled by he mysteries of life, some because they have grown to elieve more in matter and less in spirit, more in for and less in character; others because of some dis- nst us experience they have had in Christian work. Ho many Simon Peters there are in the churches of thi ity! If you are not an earnest worker, giving the be blood of your nerves and the finest enthusiasm of yo heart to the Christian Church, you are following afa off. Are you indifferent and cold? It is because yo are following afar off. Do you find it difficult to pr and impossible to read the Bible? It is because yo are following afar off. The impressions of the street ha met and overcome the impressions of the upper chamber, and no matter what you may have said in the upper chamber, you are now following afar off.

A Dangerous Way

ast think of the danger of it. Simon Peter, because he ollowed afar off, found himself at once among the enmies of Jesus. He warmed himself by the fire which the enemies of Jesus had kindled. While standing the some one said to him: "You were one of this ma's disciples?" and he said, "I am not." What a lie By and by somebody else renewed the accusation: "Srely you are one of this man's disciples?" and agn he said, "I am not." And conscious of his weakness he bolstered up his lie with an oath. By and by ome one else renewed the accusation, and again he re ied with an oath still more furious than the other: "I do not know the man." He is a traitor! First a lie, thi a lie plus profanity; then a lie and profanity plus trechery. He is descending the rounds of a ladder, the dcent to hell is easy. We have a common saying: "Let thdevil take the hindmost," and in a certain sense that is hat the devil always does. The professing Christians wh m the devil catches are always the Christians who are skulking in the rear. The men and women in the forefront of the Lord's army, are the only ones who are safe. We are coming out of Egypt, and Pharaoh and all his hosts are after us. The Egyptians are our former sins, and they will overtake us if we do not keep close to the Captain of our salvation. Every minister knows that the devil is always in pursuit of his church, and he also knows that the ones which the devil will get are the hindmost. Are you following the Lord afar off? Do not do it any more; you are in danger. If you lie a little, no one knows what you will do next; if you are a little dishonest, no one can tell what you will do later; if you are a little indifferent, no one can prophesy what your indifference will lead to. Do not follow afar off.

But what was the outcome of it all? After Peter had told his lie, he glanced up to the court-house window and there his eyes met the eyes of Jesus. Jesus was looking toward him—Jesus had heard his lie, and Peter's heart was broken. Leaving the crowd and the fire he slunk away into the darkness and cried as only a strong man can cry. But that was not the end. If I should close my sermon there it would be a most lugubrious message—but Peter crying in the night is not the end of the story. Let us follow it to the end. All day Saturday Peter was in tears. It was the darkest day through which he had ever lived. He had given up all hope. The glare of the Roman torches had put out the light of Jesus' words concerning the resurrection. But early on the first day of the week Jesus rose from the dead, and to the first person whom he met he said, "Go, tell my disciples, and Peter." Why does he say, "And Peter?" Was not Peter a disciple? Yes, he had been, but he counted himself a disciple now no longer. In his humiliation and despair he no longer numbered himself among the disciples. An outcast, a vagabond, a man who had lied and sworn and proved treacherous to his best friend could no longer count himself a disciple, and so Peter was still in the darkness weeping. But the Lord of love says to the woman, "Go, tell my disciples, and Peter." The Lord of love puts Peter in; he is still a member of the circle; he is still a friend. He must not stay in the darkness; he must come back into the light. "Go, tell my disciples and Peter that I go before them and will meet them all in the dear old familiar places where I used to meet them in the olden days."

Peter Reinstated

And true to his promise, Jesus met him there. It happened early one morning, Peter and the disciples were out upon the sea, and on coming near the shore they saw a familiar form, and heard a familiar voice. Peter, impatient to reach the shore, dashed into the water, and swam to reach Jesus first. To the penitent and joyful-hearted fisherman Jesus said: "Simon, son of Jonas, do you love me? Do you love me? Do you love me?" And Peter, the brave and noble Peter of the upper chamber, rose up and said: "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." And if there is a parallel between Simon Peter and ourselves in all our blundering and our sinning, there is also a parallel between Simon Peter and ourselves in all the possibilities of forgiveness and redemption. The Christian religion is the religion of redemption. It never lets a man go. It follows him through the street. God has his eye upon us even when we warm ourselves before the fire which the world has kindled. He sees us when we are weeping in the night. And he says as he said on that first great Sunday: "Go, tell Peter—the man who has been following afar off—that I go before him, and will meet him in the same place in which we met long ago." And he addresses to each one of us the question: "Do you love me? Do you love me? Do you love me?" What shall our answer be? We can have no answer more fitting or more satisfying to the heart of Jesus than just the answer which the repentant fisherman gave. And when at last we come in off the sea of time, battered and bruised by the storms, happy shall we be if we are able to say: "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee."

KING OSCAR LAYS DOWN HIS SCEPTRE

KING OSCAR

THE CROWN PRINCESS OF SWEDEN AND HER HOUSEHOLD

CROWN PRINCE GUSTAF

CROWN PRINCE GUSTAF, of Sweden, has again taken up the reins of government, having been appointed Regent by his father, King Oscar. The latter has become thoroughly weary of the exacting duties of his kingly office; and it would surprise no one if he were to abdicate the throne, and let his son reign indefinitely. The belief is growing in some quarters, that this will increase the probability of the long-talked-of separation of Sweden from Norway, and that a Scandinavian Tribund will be formed, comprising Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

The Crown Prince of Sweden is, probably, the most serious-minded of Europe's future sovereigns, his intellect and intelligence being a direct gift from his scholarly father. He has been a hard student, and is highly cultivated in the arts, and in all of the modern languages. He is a first-rate mechanical engineer, a keen motorist, and a mechanic, and it is even said in Stockholm, that he has suggested several good improvements to some of the leading French makes of automobiles. He is married to a cousin of the German Kaiser, the Princess Victoria of Baden, and has several children, whose education is of the most rigid, and their life of the most simple character.

This is not the first time that King Oscar has surrendered the government to the Crown Prince, for he much prefers to be an independent gentleman than to be a reigning monarch. The following story well illustrates his unconventionality:

One evening there was a group of gentlemen discussing various forms of government, in the smoking-room of a Wiesbaden hotel. One of the party advocated with some eloquence and no little logic, the Republican form, and showed why, in his opinion, a Republic was the best safeguard of the rights of the people. At an adjacent table sat a tall, white-bearded gentleman, who listened with interest to the discussion. The advocate of Republicanism caught the gleam of a smile in this gentleman's face, and exclaimed:

"You don't seem convinced by my argument, sir. Perhaps you are a Monarchist?"

The white-bearded gentleman intimated that he was.

"Well, sir," said the Republican, with a swift and meaning glance at his friends, "would you mind giving us your reasons for preferring a monarchy?"

"Sir," said the Monarchist, "the first and foremost reason is that I am myself a king."

The white-bearded gentleman was Oscar of Sweden.

King Oscar II. is "every inch a king," in that he is tall, handsome, and, with all his seventy-five years, still of magnificent physique. He speaks English fluently, as well as German, French, Italian, and Spanish, and has not forgotten his Latin; all this, of course, in addition to Swedish and Norwegian.

He is a man quite out of the ordinary, and can hold his own with anyone, as a linguist, an orator, a poet, a musician, or as a scientist.

Like most of his royal confreres, King Oscar has been decorated with nearly every order in Europe, but the honor he cherishes most is the medal of the French Humane Society, presented to the King thirty-six years ago, when he was still Crown Prince. As he was walking along the Corniche road one afternoon, a runaway carriage and pair dashed toward him. The Prince, with his usual presence of mind, ran to the horses' heads, and after being dragged some distance, succeeded in stopping them. For this act of courage he received the medal.

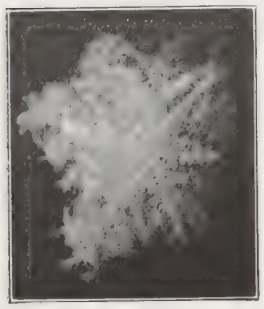
The Crown Prince Regent was recently visiting a school and inspecting one of the young girls' classes, who were considerably excited by a visit from their future king.

"Can you tell me," asked he, "the names of the great kings of Sweden?" "Gustavus Adolphus," answered one girl. "Charles XII.," responded another. "Oscar II.," stammered the smallest, who was something of a courtier in her juvenile way. The prince, much amused, went up to her and asked her to tell him one of the great events of the reign. The child blushed, hesitated, and finally, in tears, murmured: "I don't know any." The prince, smiling, stroked the child's hair and said: "Don't cry, dear—I don't know any myself!"

The Beauties of the Frost

BY WILSON A. BENTLEY

HOW wonderful, indeed, are the many, ever-changing moods and aspects of nature, as revealed to us by the cycles of the seasons! Each brings its own peculiar revelation of manifold duties and of the marvelous perfection of the laws of the Creator.



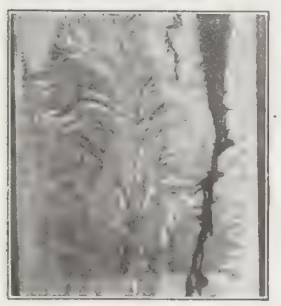
A REPRODUCTION OF AUTUMN LEAVES

Nature seems ever solicitous to array itself in the garb of beauty; and though she casts aside for a time the verdure of summer and the more gorgeous habiliments of autumn, she adorns herself afresh in jewels wrought by the magic of the frost. During the cold, still autumn nights, she fashions tiny prototypes of leaves in crystal, to replace and adorn the naked twigs from which they fell; and when, at last, the reign of winter is firmly established, the clouds drop their white snow mantle pityingly over all, and transform and beautify the world anew. Nothing seems so insignificant as to be unworthy of reproduction in frost forms. Old rail-fences, decayed stumps of some long-fallen trees, and even our own footprints in the snow, are made to glitter with fairy-like adornments.

LIKE A FOREST OF SMALL PINE TREES

In a previous article, the "wonders and beauties of the snow" were touched upon. The beauties and varied designs of the frost crystals are scarcely less wonderful than those of the snow. But the molecules of water, of which the frost crystals are constructed, are somewhat hampered in their motions and affinities for one another. Hence the frost crystals, except the columnar varieties, rarely attain to such perfect symmetry as do the snow crystals. Moreover, they usually rest upon some support, which prevents their development in certain directions. So they appear more frequently in segmental, than in completed symmetrical forms.

The life history of the frost crystals is, in some respects, quite different from that of the tiny crystals that the clouds sometimes shower down upon the earth. The invisible water molecules of which the frost is builded are not brought from a distance, as are most of those which go to form the snow crystals, but are drawn from among those that are floating around and within our habitations, or exist in the air at slight elevations. The manner of formation of the many varieties of frost is somewhat different for each type.



A KNIGHTLY PLUME OF FEATHERS

The hoar frost crystals that arise so mysteriously from branch and leaf and grassy blade, and that gleam forth from field and hillside to greet the early riser with their scintillations, are constructed from water molecules, brought down by interchange of the colder air from above, holding them in solution with the surface air.

Such is not the case with window frost, and the varieties that form within barns, outbuildings, and other inclosed situations. They are commonly constructed from the moisture due to the breath of animals or human beings, or that thrown off from steaming kettles. Other varieties of frost are due to the crystallizing of the cold moisture that evaporates from brooks and pools, wet soil, and from the surface of ice. Those that sometimes form upon the trees, upon mountain tops, come from the moisture contributed by the clouds. Owing to the fact that they rest upon supports, and often develop during considerable periods of time, many of the frost crystals attain to a far greater size than do the snow crystals. Individual frost crystals, such as frequently project from the surfaces of brook and pond ice in zero weather, often exceed two inches in diameter; the beautiful pendants of tabular frost crystals that sometimes attach themselves to cobwebs and so forth, in barn lofts, occasionally attain to a collective diameter of many inches.

The forms and structure of the frost crystals are so exceedingly varied, that mention of but a few of them can be made in a short article. As with the snow crystals, two principal types occur: those that develop upon columnar plans, and those that develop upon thin tabular plans. The varieties that often adorn our window-panes, and that arise in beautiful fern-like clusters from the surface of the ice in zero weather, are examples of the latter. The long bundles of icy needles that form upon the surface of brook ice, and the tiny hexagonal columns and hollow cylinders that attach themselves in such vast numbers to the grasses of the meadows and hillsides during the cold, calm nights of autumn and spring, are examples of the former. These columnar forms are such as almost invariably appear during the destructive frosts that sometimes occur during those seasons, while during the winter, or when the cold is more severe, the hoar frost crystals are more frequently tabular in form. Singularly enough, commonly but one variety or type of hoar frost occurs in great numbers on a given night. The great majority will be either tabular or columnar in form, and the type of crystal of the opposite variety will appear only upon objects lying directly upon the bare soil, and not isolated from it.

One of the principal charms of frost study, and one that adds immeasurably to our interest in it, is due to the fact that we can see and watch the crystals while in process of formation. No insurmountable altitudes, no screen of dark clouds, hides or obscures them from view while they are growing. Though we cannot actually see the builders, because the most powerful optical aid at present command fails utterly to resolve particles of matter so minute. Yet we can watch the fairy-like frost structures develop, as if by magic, on window-pane, or twig, or shrub. What more fascinating task can be imagined during zero weather than that of watching the varied frost designs appear on window-panes, and trying to learn and to penetrate the many mysteries that enshroud them, and the secrets of what determines and controls the forms and structures they shall assume, the paths they shall pursue upon the glass, and noting whether designs occurring at a given time and place, and during certain temperatures, will be duplicated again when those identical conditions recur.

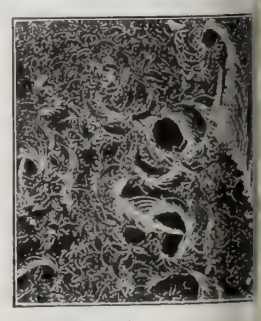
The window frost designs are perhaps the most var and beautiful of all frost creations. What fairy l scenes are often pictured thereon! Castles and fore and ferns and feathery plumes, besides other fanci designs, appear from time to time in endless variety.

But not all the window canvasses are painted by the frost artist; many of them, and, indeed, within heated rooms, most of them, are wrought by the ice designs within the very thin and transparent film of water that, usually unnoticed, often lies spread evenly over the window-panes within our dwellings during zero weather. All the large feather, or fern-like window-pane designs, are really ice crystallizations. Beautiful experiments can be made, and the formation of both the true frost and a the ice crystallizations, can be watched and studied placing a lighted lamp close to a window-pane, a letting it remain there until a large space in the cen of the window is freed of all frost and water fil Around this dry space a film of water should be l for ice crystallizations to form within. Soon af removing the lamp, feather-like, and also the more delicate twig or tree-like ice crystals, will begin to form around the outer edges of the water film, and shoot inward toward the centre of the pane. As soon as they reach the dry glass in the centre, they instantly stop growing.

A SPIDER OF SHINING CRYSTALS

BEAUTIFUL FLOWER OR MOSS DESIGN

The dry glass spaces should now be closely watched. Soon, delicate, star-like, or serrated lines of true frost crystals, appear at and upon certain portions of the dry gla and quickly develop. Almost simultaneously wi them, an exceedingly thin granular deposit, due the condensation of water particles, will be deposite and freeze upon portions of the dry glass; but note t fact, away from the immediate vicinity of the delicat true frost crystals (the stars and serrated lines). T latter seem to repel the liquid particles. In zero weather, such granular films are often deposited with amazing rapidity by a succession of aurora-like flashes, and soon cover all the dry glass spaces, except those portions occupied by, or lying close to, the true frost crystals.



JACK FROST'S OWN CARPET PATTERN

The realm of the frost king is yet full of mysteries. It has been but little explored, and will richly repay, with both knowledge and enjoyment, all who shall essay to ent and further explore its fairy-like confines.

MOTHER'S WORK

By Margaret E. Sangster

DEAR, patient woman, o'er your children bending,
To leave a good-night kiss on rosy lips,
Or list the simple prayers to God ascending,
Ere slumber veil them in its soft eclipse,—
I wonder do you dream that seraphs love you,
And sometimes smooth the pathway for your feet;
That oft their silvery pinions float above you,
When life is tangled and its cross-roads meet?

So wan and tired, the whole long day so busy;
To laugh or weep, at times, you hardly know;
So many trifles make the poor brain dizzy,
So many errands call you to and fro.
Small garments stitching, weaving fairy stories,
And binding wounds and bearing little cares,
Your hours pass; unheeded all the glories
Of that great world beyond your nursery stairs.
One schoolmate's pen has written words of beauty;
Her poems sing themselves into the heart.
Another's brush has magic, you have duty,
No time to spare for poetry or art,
But only time for training little fingers,
And teaching youthful spirits to be true;
You know not with what famine woman lingers,
With art alone to fill her, watching you.

And yet, I think you'd rather keep the babies,
Albeit their heads grow heavy on your arm,
Than have the poet's fair, enchanted maybe's,
The artist's visions, rich with dazzling charm.
Sweet are the troubles of the happy hours,
For even in weariness your soul is blest;
And rich contentment all your being dowers,
That yours is not a hushed and empty nest.

THE SHIP'S AIRY DINING-ROOM

MR. JOHN ARBUCKLE

RECEPTION ROOM OF THE "STAMLER"

The Working Girls' Floating Hotel

A FEW of the thousands of working girls of New York can now find comfortable quarters in the Floating Hotel provided by the benevolent generosity of Mr. John Arbuckle, the wealthy coffee merchant, and which is moored at the foot of West Twenty-first Street. It is as yet merely an experiment, but he feels confident that this unique philanthropy will meet with success, "For," said Mr. Arbuckle, "I am not going to leave anything undone that may be needed to make the guests comfortable."

Lying snugly in her berth, is the old, full-rigged ship, Jacob A. Stamler, which formerly sailed between New York and Havre. A few years ago she was practically rebuilt from the water up. The idea of turning the vessel into a hotel was suggested to Mr. Arbuckle by the success which had attended his former experiment of giving short sea-trips, in the summer, to poor children and their mothers. The idea naturally followed of turning the ship into a hotel, so that the people who toil in the sweltering shops through the day, might have the benefit of a sail at night, returning in time for work the next morning. From this idea there came another, with the result that the ship and her companions, the twin-screw propeller and a large sailing yacht, were anchored at a pier in New York, and open-doors hotels for men and women who earn small wages. The next step was the installation of steam-heat and electric light plants. The staterooms and saloons were remodeled and painted. Then the inside of the big ships were sheathed and made impervious to odors, so that the air would be pure and agreeable. The staterooms were filled up with most comfortable beds and bedding; and a large fan drives pure air into every room through branch pipes.

The John Wise and the yacht Anna—the latter a vessel which cost originally about $100,000—are fitted up for men's sleeping quarters, while the larger vessel is occupied by women. The large airy dining-room on the Stamler is for both men and women. The main saloon is fitted up for a music and reception room, and throughout the ship there are soft carpets. The deepest of "sleepy-hollow" arm-chairs suggest that the man who provided them not only knew what real comfort was himself, but was willing that others should share it with him.

Being asked who was captain, "I am," Mr. Arbuckle replied, and he looked it. Bluff and hearty, with a kindly eye, capable of the sternest of expressions when it comes to a question of right or wrong, "Captain" Arbuckle seems just the man to command the hotel squadron. He is the greatest coffee-mill man in the world. He also has large sugar-refinery interests; and, in other ways, he is in close connection with the base of food supplies necessary for the provisioning of the floating hotel. For these reasons, such cheap rates are possible. He is sympathetic, delighting in associating with the beneficiaries of his philanthrophy. Mr. Arbuckle's benefaction is thus rendered practical and economical. It is his aim to eliminate every appearance of mere charity.

Mr. Arbuckle has already spent more than $200,000 on his floating hotels and deep-sea excursions. "My business," said he, "has for many years brought me in connection with thousands of men and women who work hard for a living; and I have become aware of the real conditions under which so many of these people have to live. This is especially true of young women. I am sure that there are other business men, who, with these facts before them, would find satisfaction in utilizing vacant accommodations of various kinds, for the benefit of respectable men and women of slender incomes. When I have been on my deep-sea excursions, and have seen magnificent yachts passing, I felt I was getting a great deal more pleasure out of my ship than the owners of the yachts were getting out of theirs.

An abundance of good food is served on the Stamler. Women will pay forty cents a day, and will be expected to care for their rooms; men will pay fifty cents, and their rooms will be cared for. The "crew" has been selected with great care; and the ship will be in charge of people who will see that everything runs smoothly. No drinking of alcoholic stimulants will be permitted. Sunlight shines all around the vessels; no tall tenements or "sky-scrapers" interfere with air or light. There is no sewer gas or other city-vitiated air.

The first meal served aboard was dinner, which consisted of old-fashioned chicken pot-pie, with vegetables, apple sauce, prunes and coffee. The young women who have already settled in the hotel are employed in department stores, and receive an average of six dollars per week. The men are mechanics and tradesmen, drawing low wages. "The poorer you are," said Mr. Arbuckle, "the more cheerfully you will be received, provided you are respectable."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. S., Kansas. "A year ago I was threatened with a total blindness and I went to God in prayer, and he heard and answered, and partially restored my sight."

S. L. G., Ohio, "I wish to acknowledge to the world God's goodness to me. He has answered my prayer. I have heard to-day from my far-away boy. God is good to us."

A Believer in Prayer, N. Y. "I was to undergo a painful illness, in which I asked the Lord to be with me, and to give me 'faith, courage, and patience,' which he did not fail to do."

E. L., Pennsylvania. "I wish to acknowledge that the whole world that my prayers have been answered. He cares for every one of us, and we can safely go to Him in our trouble."

Mr. and Mrs. I. W. B., Oregon. "We have been helped in the column of 'Answered Prayers,' and wish to testify that the Lord has answered our prayers in both spiritual and temporal affairs."

Reader, Alabama. "Many times I have received an answer, but one petition of late, especially, demands recognition and thankfulness. I have been greatly blest by reading answered prayers."

Mary P. S., N. Y. "For several years a certain matter perplexed me greatly. I asked for guidance, and that strength might be given me to leave it in God's hands, the answer came, full and satisfying."

Mrs. J. N. N., New Hampshire. "I am especially comforted by the 'Answered Prayer' column. I have a dear one who strayed away. I am still waiting for the dear Lord to answer my prayer for him."

Constant Reader, Washington, D. C. "I am earnestly praying for a dear one to be brought to Christ, and ask THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family to pray for him. We have the promise if we ask in faith, in his name, we shall receive."

Dora T., Nebraska. "I have been much interested in the Answered Prayers. It has strengthened my faith to know that others are praying, and that God does hear and answer them, and I have been led to pray more earnestly myself."

Mary L. B., Oklahoma Territory. "I think it is a help to all of us to read how God has blessed and answered the prayers of others. It has strengthened my faith. God heard and answered our prayers and restored my mother to health."

An Old Subscriber. "In many things I have found God a great comforter. I am now praying for the conversion of a young man. The way seems very dark to him, but I am praying earnestly that he may find God."

Henry M., Kansas. "I read with delight the testimonials of God's love and kindness. I learned to quiet myself before God; it was then that I heard his voice. We are prone to rely too much on our feelings. Feelings come and go, but the facts of spiritual experience are permanent. I did not get the sudden revelation I was looking for, but realized a peace, like a river, slowly but surely flowing back into my soul, for which I can and do praise the Lord."

A Pugilist Converted

Harry Mainard, a pugilist, has been converted at Red Bluff, Calif. He has been a victor in fifty different battles. He owned at one time a saloon in San Francisco, and in the last few years he and his wife have traveled around the world. He has now closed up his saloon here and will sell liquor no more, he declares. He is going about trying to seek and save the lost.

The revival at Red Bluff has become a notable one. Rev. E. R. Hermiston, the Chapel Car Evangelist, is in charge of the work and all denominations are interested. The Baptist Church is crowded at every service and the whole city is moved with a powerful revival. Numbers are coming forward to renew the religious life. The movement may result in closing the twenty-five saloons at Red Bluff.

Creed and Conduct

ONE of our correspondents asks a question, which has repeatedly been asked in various forms by others. In these days of united evangelistic services it is sure to arise, and to cause more anxiety than it deserves. It is as to the denomination to which a convert should attach himself. Is a certain creed, or a certain form of belief essential to salvation? is the form in which one writer phrases the question. Another goes still further, and asks if it matters what a man believes, so long as his life is right. The fact that eminent religious teachers differ so widely about the doctrines of Christianity, perplexes the young convert, who is anxious to do right and to be right.

A great deal of this anxiety is unnecessary. Though religious teachers in the evangelical denominations differ in details, they are united in the essentials. In all the denominations there are good men, striving earnestly to live the Christ life, and are finding in their respective creeds the help that they need. The one essential is to be delivered from sin, from selfishness and indifference. Mere creed, or opinion, can never save a man. There are many who are thoroughly orthodox, who have no right to the name of Christian. To believe in Christ; to give our lives into his keeping; to trust in his power to save us from evil; to make public confession of him; to yield ourselves unreservedly to his will in all things; to endeavor strenuously to live as he would have us live; to be humble, kind, useful in all our relations—this is to be a Christian. A man's belief on predestination, on election, on free-will, on divine sovereignty, on future punishment, may differ from the creed of this or that denomination, but it cannot affect his standing as a Christian. Whether a man unite with the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist or any other evangelical denomination, is a matter of personal preference. Early associations, family ties, regard for ritual, or some particular form of church government—all may have their effect in determining church association. But whatsoever connection he may form, if he has the essentials we have enumerated, he is one of the Lord's people, a soldier of Christ, enrolled in one of the regiments of Christ's army.

Peace in the Balance

THERE are hopeful signs that the war in the Far East is nearing a close. Cable dispatches intimate that Russia, heartily sick of the war, and terrorized by the acts of the revolutionary party at home, is considering the acceptance of terms of peace. Such negotiations move slowly, and there may be further fighting in Manchuria meanwhile; but it is apparent that the end of the disastrous campaign is near. According to the cablegrams, the peace terms will include practically every substantial point for which Japan has been contending, viz: Corea to be under Japanese suzerainty; Port Arthur and the Liao-Tung peninsula to be held by Japan; Vladivostok to be a neutral port; the Chinese Eastern railway to be placed under neutral international management and Russia to evacuate and restore to China all of Manchuria, as far north as Harbin. No indemnity may be asked, but, if so, its extent will be decided by arbitration hereafter. In these later negotiations, our own government may be called upon to take no unimportant part.

That the rumors of approaching peace should be denied in official quarters is not surprising. Diplomacy's first duty, apparently, is to conceal the facts. Even while she sees the inevitable, Russia would fain have the world believe that she is as resolute as ever in her determination to carry on the war. Her high officials point out that Kouropatkin's position is impregnable, that he has the distinct advantage in the number of men and the strength of his artillery, and that the veteran Oyama is even now fought to a standstill. But such protestations are to be regarded as proceeding from a desire to save the nation's prestige. It has been evident for some time past that Russia had lost all hope of making headway against her stubborn enemy, either by land or sea. The admitted collapse of the Manchurian land campaign, of which great things were expected, and the hesitancy in risking an encounter between the Baltic squadrons and Admiral Togo's victorious fleet, were sufficient to convince all except the most sanguine Russian optimists, that the prolongation of the war would be an invitation to new disasters and deeper humiliation. From first to last, the Czar's forces have been out-generalled by their vigilant and able foe. It has been a repetition, on a larger scale, of the Franco-German campaign of 1871, when the result proved the utter unpreparedness of France for war, the incompetency of her military leaders, and the unreliability of all official statements concerning the condition of her army, her fortresses, and her military commissariat. France has not even yet fully recovered from the loss of prestige that resulted from that war, and it may be safely predicted that Russia's prestige among the great nations of the world, will also suffer for many years from the blow it has sustained in the Far East.

But there is, fortunately, in the case of Russia, a brighter side to this gloomy picture of defeat. If the war should result, as is not at all improbable, in the unification of Russian interests at home, on the basis of a more liberal government, with popular representation as demanded by the people of the throne; in a word, if it should become the means of curbing the power of the heartless and rapacious Russian bureaucracy, and bringing about the reforms that are essential to the welfare and progress of the Russian people, the lost prize of Eastern supremacy will not be regretted, since the sacrifice of blood and treasure will have resulted in securing the more precious prize of social, political, and industrial freedom for nearly two hundred million souls.

THAT the government means to push with vigor the movement to bring the trusts under proper regulation, is evident from the fact that quite recently, simultaneous steps have been taken in fifteen cities for that purpose. In the first instance, the Beef Trust has been selected as the defendant in a proceeding which is designed to punish the packers for conspiracy to violate the anti-trust laws. Eight months ago, the United States Supreme Court issued an injunction which was intended to compel certain Trusts, and more particularly the Beef Trust, to reform their business methods, which were declared to be illegal and hostile to public interests. Notwithstanding the clear exposition of the law on that occasion, the abuses complained of have been persisted in, and there has not been the slightest attempt at modification. Ignoring the courts altogether, the packers have continued to conduct their business in a manner calculated to restrain trade and to keep the great mass of consumers wholly at their mercy as to prices and supplies, irrespective of the normal condition of the beef market and the necessities of the public.

This initial movement against the Beef Trust is the logical result of an investigation now in progress in the Departments of Commerce and Justice in Washington. Attorney-General Moody will undertake to secure the indictment of the packers on the charge of conspiracy to restrain trade, in direct violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law and in defiance of the United States Courts. The progress of this experimental prosecution will be watched with intense interest by the whole country. In the same category with the Beef Trust must be classed the trusts and combinations which, for at least five years past, have controlled a large number of the leading necessaries of life, notably coal, oil, and flour. Their selfish and grasping operations have been the cause of widespread hardship and suffering. Foodstuffs, meat and fuel have steadily risen in price, and living has been made more and more difficult, especially for the poor, upon whom these exactions bear most heavily. Nor is the ascending scale marked by a decline, no matter what the actual condition may be as to the supply.

Any legal means that may be found to check these freebooters of trade will be welcomed by the American people. There may be, and doubtless there are, trusts that are legitimate and honestly conducted, with due regard to the rights of the public, and the law of supply and demand; but the tyrannous combinations that seek to enrich themselves by illegal extortion, compelling the consumer to pay fabulous prices, and abnormally restraining and diverting trade, regardless of consequences and in direct violation of laws enacted f the public protection, are wholly outside the pale legitimate enterprise. If Attorney-General Moo should succeed in his righteous crusade against the lawbreakers, he will deserve to be congratulated, a the Administration will have effectually redeemed i pledge to compel the trusts to obey the statute law the land.

A Case of Conscience

A PATHETIC case of impaired usefulness has deve oped in one of our Western churches. It is th of a young man whose talents and consecration fit hi for service in Christ's cause, but he is held back by h conscience. In his boyhood days, he was led int grievous sin by evil companions. When he was co verted, he humbly confessed his sin to God, and, as h believed, received divine forgiveness. He resolutel put the sin away from him and has never fallen a vi tim to it since. When the opportunity for service cam to him, the question arose whether he ought to mak full confession to the world of his early fall. It wa not exposure that he dreaded, but he was disturbed b a question of his duty. Rather than make a confessio he refrained from religious activity.

Probably there are many in a like difficulty. Whe a man has wronged another, it is his duty to make co fession to the one whom he has wronged, and to do a in his power to make restitution. He is under no obli gation to make public confession. Still less is it hi duty, when his sin is between himself and God. Wit this the world has nothing to do. It could not under stand the circumstances, and it would be prone to thin of him, not as he really is, a victor over sin, but as weak man who has been vanquished in the struggle wit evil. His influence would be impaired, and no sou would be benefited by hearing his story. On the othe hand, it might do harm. Sinners are ever ready t make excuses for themselves out of the sins of othe men. Dissolute men, to this day, plead the example o David as an extenuation of their sins, though they d not follow his example in repentance. Let no person b moved to needless disclosure by a morbid idea of duty, no kept from service by a conscience that God has purged Let him be content with divine forgiveness, and no seek from the world the pardon it has not the right t give or withhold.

ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, in Washington, has beer denominated, "The Church of the President," by reason of the fact that every President, from Madison to Lincoln, worshiped there, and several others have done so in later years. Mrs. Roosevelt is a member o this church, and regularly attends the morning as well as the afternoon services. President Roosevelt is an adherent of the Dutch Reformed denomination—the faith of his ancestors—and is a member of Grace Reformed Church in Washington. He rarely is absent from the morning service at his own church. Our photograph on the first page shows the President and Mrs. Roosevelt coming from St. John's Church at the close of afternoon service.

Except in the severest weather, the members of the White House family always walk to church. In the case of Mrs. Roosevelt and those who accompany her, the walk is a short one, for St. John's Church is located directly across the park from the White House; but the President's church is situated fully half a mile from the Executive Mansion. The President, on his morning walk to and from church, is usually attended by several Secret Service men. Mr. Roosevelt always joins heartily in the responses and the congregational singing.

Among the Workers

—THAT FANNY CROSBY, the aged hymn writer, is still active and interested in Christian work, is shown by the following letter:

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—Some dear friends have been greatly interested in my coming birthday, and have asked me to tell you that I endorse and thank them for all their kindly interest in me.

Sincerely yours, FANNY CROSBY.

Russia's Crisis

SOCIAL unrest in Russia has spread from the Capital to the Provinces. Many cities in the South, as well as in Poland and the Caucasus, report strikes both in the railroads and in factories. Western Poland was completely cut off from communication with the rest of Europe last week, except by telegraph. All mails were stopped, and there was no railroad service. At Baku, the strikers resorted to violence, which was suppressed, say the government reports, "not without bloodshed." The strike in Poland is extending to all trades, including bank-clerks, printers, and office servants. The demands of the strikers are far from exorbitant, but the employers contend that they cannot grant them unless a law is passed requiring their competitors in other cities to pay the same rate of wage.

An incident reported by a French newspaper correspondent confirms the belief that the strikes have a political rather than an economic basis. He says that a factory owner whose men had struck, summoned them to a meeting to state their grievances. They told him that they had not, like so many workmen, to complain either of their hours or their remuneration, but they wanted a Constitution. He informed them that he was very sorry, but that he had not the power to give them that. They replied that they would remain on strike till they got one. It would appear that Russian reformers are using the workingmen to agitate and embarrass the Government, in order to compel political reforms. The students in the Universities are joining in the same demand, and have been outspoken in their appeals to the Czar to grant concessions.

Our illustration on this page shows a scene in the Czar's palace, at which thirty-four workmen, representing the chief industries of St. Petersburg, were received. The list was made up by employers of labor, and was carefully scrutinized by the chief of police to see that no member of a socialistic organization was included. The Czar did not permit them to state their grievances, but read an address to them describing his attitude. He said he had summoned them in order that they might hear his words and communicate them to their comrades. After expressing sympathy with their lot, he said, "You understand very well that it is necessary to be just towards your masters, and to take into consideration the condition of our industry; but to come to me as a rebel mob to declare your wants is a crime." The men were then sent away without having an opportunity of stating their needs.

It is believed that the Czar contemplates summoning an ancient body known as the Zemski Sobor, which was in existence two hundred and fifty years ago, which was practically a representative body. It consists of four houses: the nobles, the clergy, the merchants, and the peasants. It is not a legislative, but a consultative body. Should such an assembly be convoked, the first step will be taken toward a Constitution. As in the French Revolution, an assembly of that kind might easily increase its power until the despotism of the Government was transformed into a constitutional monarchy. Some such concession will have to be made, otherwise a reign of terror may ensue, in which the whole royal family may perish, as did the Grand Duke Sergius. The Czar is now at the crisis of his fate. To such as he, the ancient king's warning is pertinent.

Be wise, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed ye judges of the earth (Psa. 2: 10).

THE CZAR ADDRESSING A DEPUTATION OF WORKINGMEN IN HIS PALACE AT TSARSKOE SELO

Limited Marriages

An astonishing bill has been introduced into the Legislature of Colorado. It provides that marriages in that State in future shall be of a limited kind. The parties to the contract are to state the length of time for which the union is to continue. The contract is to be for not less than three years, nor for more than ten. A provision is made that at any period after six months from the date of the marriage, the parties may appear before the officer of the court who performed the marriage, and notify him that they have determined to change the contract from a limited period to a life contract. Otherwise the union is to cease at the time specified in the original contract, and the property to be divided as then arranged. The children of the marriage are to be confided to the care of either party as arranged at the time of the marriage. It may be hoped that no such measure will be enacted. It is bad enough to have to grant divorces to couples whose matrimonial troubles have become intolerable; but to deliberately provide for breaking a union which God intended to be permanent would be a disgrace to any State.

They twain shall be one flesh. What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder (Mark 10: 8).

A Juvenile Forger

One of the most remarkable cases hitherto heard in the Children's Court in New York came to trial a few days ago. The prisoner was a bright little girl only fifteen years of age. She had been employed in a millinery establishment in Fifth Avenue. It was about a year ago that she entered the service of the milliners, and her intelligence speedily won for her the confidence of her employers. Two weeks ago the annual audit of the books took place, and it was found that there was a discrepancy in the bank account, of more than five hundred dollars. Checks had been drawn on the bank that the firm knew nothing of. They were traced to the little assistant, who had been in the habit of taking money to the bank for her employers. She had thus become known to the bank tellers, who did not carefully scrutinize the checks she presented. When charged with the crime she confessed her guilt. She said, "Last summer there were several women in my neighborhood who had babies in the family, and those babies needed fresh air, excursions on the river and such little necessities, and as those women could not afford to let the babies have these things, I gave the women money at first part of my weekly salary; then later on that was not enough, and I got acquainted at the bank, and used some bad checks to collect money on." There seems reason to doubt whether the money was all used in charity; but even if it had been, the excuse was not valid. No one has any right to do evil that good may come. As David said, even a gift cannot be rightly used us an offering.

Neither will I offer burnt offerings unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing (II Samuel 24: 24).

Grew Tree for a Coffin

A strange story is told of an aged citizen of Missouri. He was one of the early settlers of the county in which he still lives. When he cleared up the land for his farm, he left in the middle of one field a small walnut tree. The tree was then about two inches in diameter, but perfectly straight and symmetrical. Often in the years which followed, he was asked why he left that tree to shade valuable land, and his invariable answer was that he intended to live until that tree was big enough to make the boards for his coffin. About a year ago he had the walnut tree, then an enormous and handsome tree, cut down and sawed into planks. It showed a beautiful grain, and the boards were perfect. These boards are now carefully put away in a dry place and are seasoning, and from them, the farmer says his coffin is to be made. He is now eighty-seven years of age, but is not yet ready to send the boards to the cabinet maker. Other people can do that for him, if he should die before he is ready; but we trust he has made preparations for a habitation for his soul, which is of infinitely more importance, and this he must seek himself.

I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course (II. Timothy 4: 6).

BRIEF NOTES

General Booth proposes to pay another visit to Australia, and will afterwards embark upon another motor campaign throughout his own country. He is seventy five years old.

Tibet's 6,000,000 people have to support an army or 430,000 priests, who produce nothing but beautifully illuminated copies of the sacred writings. They hold all the public offices.

We are glad to learn that Rev. R. Winsor, M.A., of Sirur, India, whose services in the great famine were most devoted, has been honored by the King of England with the Kaiser-i-Hind medal.

The many friends of Gipsy Smith in this country, will be glad to learn that he has rendered efficient aid in the Welsh revival. At Pontypridd, 917 persons made confession of Christ at his meetings.

Mr. John R. Mott, M.A., foreign secretary of the International Committee of Y.M.C.A.'s, is visiting England. He gave an address to men students in the Mansion House London, at which the Bishop of London presided.

The Melbourne express, traveling at a high speed, was stopped near Adelaide by a demented woman standing on the rails and waving a handkerchief. She shook hands with the engine-driver and told him she had a divine order to stop all trains on Sundays.

During the Munhall meetings at Jacksonville, Fla., it was stated by a prominent saloon-keeper and reported in the Times-Union of that city, that the business of all the saloons had fallen off twenty per cent.

It was stated at the recent annual meeting of the London Metropolitan Tabernacle, of which Rev. Thomas Spurgeon is pastor, in succession to his revered father, Charles H. Spurgeon, that there are 4,183 members on the communion roll. This, it is claimed, is the largest Baptist Church in the world.

THE POOL OF SILOAM

"The Light of the World"

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE story of the blind man at the pool of Siloam shows what a wide range of experience a human being may pass through in a day's time. He awoke a blind beggar; he became a restored man; he became an excommunicated man; he became an earnest inquirer, and he became a follower of Christ.

This lesson naturally divides into four great themes:

1. The pity of Jesus. 2. The power of Jesus. 3. The credulity and bigotry of sceptics. 4. The courage and true rationalism of enlightened Christians.

1. The Pity of Jesus. In this story of the blind man we have the living original of the parable of the Good Samaritan. Here is the Good Nazarene pitying and helping a wayside beggar. The Jews of Jerusalem in their narrow prejudice, thought no good could come out of either Samaria or Nazareth, but Jesus in life and word sets the good Nazarene and the good Samaritan in contrast with the bad Jew, who tithed mint, anise and cummin, but neglected the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and truth. Those who come of tainted heredity may well take hope as they examine the "family tree" of Christ (Matt. 1, Luke 3), and find in it such notorious sinners as Rahab and Tamar and Bathsheba; indeed every ancestor of Mary, male and female, come under the charge, "All have sinned."

Jesus, having such blood on the human side, and the unfavorable surroundings of a Nazareth home, "tempted in all points like as we are," by bad blood and evil associations, was nevertheless "good;" and the explanation is in the opening note of his Nazareth sermon, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me"—words spoken first by the human Isaiah, and so intended for us all. But what we wish to emphasize is that the heart of goodness in Jesus was compassion, that is pitiful love for neighbors who need us. When "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by," impersonated in any of his people, it should bring "the Light of the World" to all who are in darkness. What an affliction is blindness! Hear the blind John Milton's lament:

With the year
Seasons return; but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of even a morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and ever during dark
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men.
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
Presented with a universal blank.

Bartimeus was in even a worse case, for having never seen the world about him, he did not have even the pleasures of remembering sights. Memory's wall had not even his mother's picture for him to look upon. Let us not forget to thank God for the daily art gallery which the blessing of sight opens to us. We should be even more grateful than Bartimeus, since we have had sight from birth. And let us use it for the glory of God and the good of men.

But really a greater calamity than blindness of eyes is blindness of heart.

Let me tell a missionary story that shows how a heaven of joy came to one who sought physical light, but found heart-sight instead. To the Amritsar Hospital came a blind Hindu woman of eighty years, who asked the doctor at the door: "Are you he who gives people new eyes?" "No, but I sometimes mend old ones." On examination it was found her case required such an operation as one of her great age could hardly be expected to go through successfully. She was so informed. "Woe is me!" she exclaimed, "for I have come far to get new eyes. I will sell all I have and give it to you, and I will bear any pain or privation if you will give me sight for even five minutes!" She explained that she had had but one son, and when he had died she had wept her eyes away, but that since his death a grandchild had been born whom she had never seen, and she said: "I will give all I have to see his face even for a moment before I die, for when I am dead I shall transmigrate into a cat, or dog, or frog; and my grandson, when he dies, will become a camel or some other animal, and so if I do not see my dear grandchild in this world I shall never see him. Help me to see him before I die." The missionary-doctor told her of God the Father, of Jesus, and of heaven, and so opened the eyes of her blinded soul. When they parted, she said: "You talk of going to heaven by-and-by. If you only knew it, in what I have heard and felt, I have heaven now!" Jesus had proved to her "the Light of life." Ah! Pity is the very heart of God in Christian men; but if we are godlike, pity for blinded hearts will be even stronger in us than pity for any bodily affliction. Many who have all the body needs or craves are blind beggars in soul, who have never seen the grandest sights—God and Christ and divine love and the joy of forgiveness.

Lead lives of love that others who Behold your lives may kindle too
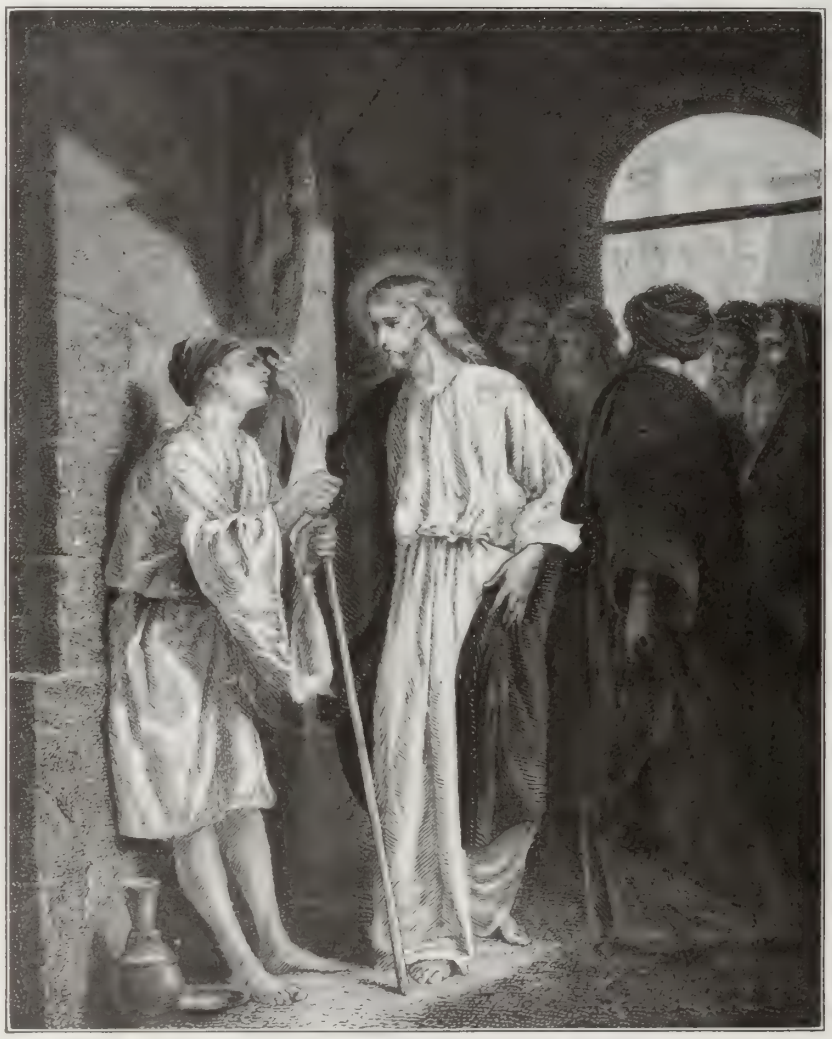
With love, and cast their lot with you. —ROSETTI.

Lincoln said: "Die when I may, I want it said of me that I always plucked a thistle and planted a flower when I thought a flower would grow."



"HE ANOINTED THE EYES OF THE BLIND MAN WITH THE CLAY"

Behold the earth, swung in among the stars,
Fit home for gods, if men were only kind.
Do thou thy part to shape it to those ends,
By shaping thine own life to perfectness.
Seek nothing for thyself, or thine own kin,
That robs another of one hope or joy.
Look for the good in stranger and in foe,
Nor save thy praises for the cherished few,
And let the weakest sinner find in thee
An impetus to reach receding heights.
—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

2. The Power of Christ. Earthly friends often have pity for us when they have no power to back up their pity. In Christ pity and power were both unbounded. He healed blind eyes, deaf ears, palsied hands, lame feet, every part of the body, to teach that he could supply every need of every soul as well. We, too, have a measure of God-given power, to bear our own burden and to help others. Behold the threefold cord that cannot be broken that should be under every burden.

Every man shall bear his own burden. Gal. 6: 5.

Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. Gal. 6: 2.

Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee. Psa. 55: 22.

3. The Credulity and Bigotry of the Sceptics. This story is a most interesting illustration that human nature is alike in all eyes. Certainly sceptics to-day are as credulous and bigoted as those of this lesson, who would not believe on the miracle worker as a Saviour but readily believed their desperate alternative that God had worked through a "sinner." So to-day those who cast aside faith substitute credulity, and prefer superstition to salvation. The man who refuses to receive Christ as both God and man, believes instead that he was good and yet a deceiver, great and yet deceived. The man who does not believe God created the stars is the very one who is afraid to look over his left shoulder at the moon, or get married on Friday, or eat in a company of thirteen. To the end of time there will be religious mysteries, that we need not fathom, but the essentials of saving faith are facts and not philosophies, and we should fix our minds on these essentials. Here is a short creed that may be useful for beginners:

"I believe in the absolute difference between Right and Wrong. I promise honestly to seek to know what is right and follow the light wherever it leads me; to examine carefully the evidence that Jesus Christ is God's Son and man's Saviour; and if I find reason to believe that he is man's Saviour, I will accept him and confess him before men and undertake to follow him."

[Signed] _____

Ian MacLaren writes: "What would you think of a man in a fire who, when they brought the fire escape to him, said, 'I decline to trust myself to it until you first of all explain to me the principles of its construction; and, secondly, tell me all about who made it; and, thirdly, inform me where all the materials of which it is made came from?' But that is very much what a number of people are doing to-day in reference to the Gospel of our salvation when they demand that the small questions—on which the central verity does not all depend — shall be answered and settled before they cast themselves upon that."

4. The true rationalism and courage of intelligent Christians. How the healed blind man, clear-seeing in mind as well as body, cuts the sophistries of the Pharisees to pieces with the Damascus blade of consecrated common sense! Sceptics call themselves "rationalists," assuming that reason is on their side, but reason is always on the side of faith, as in this incident. Faith begins in belief, which is "a persuasion of the mind based on evidence."

A man usually has the courage of his convictions, as in this story, when he has convictions enough. A British army officer, beginning a Christian life very timidly, at first could hardly give a comrade a tract or speak a personal word for Christ; but growing bolder he at length agreed to join in open-air preaching. Just as he was about to mount the chair and speak, the band of his own regiment came marching by with many of his fellow officers. He was tempted to make the excuse that he could not speak against the blare of the band, and so avoid the notice of those who would be sure to sneer at him. But the next moment he bethought him: "Is there a single soldier in that regiment that is the least bit ashamed to wear the Queen's uniform? And shall I, a soldier of the King of kings, be ashamed to take my stand amongst my brother officers as ready to fight for him? Whereupon he stood on the chair before them all and spoke for his Master. The fear of man vanished, and from that time he never hesitated to speak for Christ whenever an opportunity presented itself.

In life and death, in the battles of peace as well as those of war, the true Christian's faith casts out fear. A penny edition of the Gospel of John, so tiny that a lady could carry it inside her glove, was given by her to a Japanese soldier named Kageyama, who not only accepted it, but eagerly read it, and found through its pages that Jesus, the Son of God, the divine and only Saviour, loved him, and gave himself for him. Thereafter he carried it with him everywhere in his vest pocket. At length, upon the terrible war breaking out with Russia, the brave young fellow was summoned to join the third blocking expedition at Port Arthur. Alas! he was killed. When among the Japanese dead next morning the body of Kageyama had been discovered, there, soaked in his crimson heart-blood, lay the treasured Gospel, the light of life and death, of earth and heaven.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

CHILDREN'S DAY EXERCISES

ALTHOUGH Children's Day is still some months distant, some of our readers are very anxious to celebrate it in a unique and pleasing fashion. So far as the setting of the day is concerned, teachers may avail themselves of the flowers which will then be in bloom, and pastors will doubtless be willing to give up one session of the church services to the little ones.

I remember with great pleasure a Children's Day service in which the church was profusely decorated with the Sunday School banner, and with American flags. Flowers were also brought in pots, and garlands, and bunches, so that the church was a bower. The children sang their favorite hymns, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "Children of the Heavenly King," and other familiar songs. One dear little girl stepped forward and sang, "I Think When I Read that Sweet Story of Old." A number of children gave recitations, and the pastor preached a sermon on the subject, "Little Friends." The little friends in question were birds, squirrels, dogs, and cats. The familiar denizens of the grove, and the familiar companions of the fireside. The pastor told the children how much they ought to love these little friends, and how careful they should be to make them comfortable and happy, illustrating his sermon by many charming anecdotes of animal sagacity.

It might be a good plan to let the opening address for Children's Day be given by a young girl, who might have the honor bestowed upon her as a reward for punctual attendance during the year. In this case an address should be written for her by the superintendent or the pastor, as few young girls could prepare an appropriate talk for themselves. The address might be something in the nature of a salutatory, welcoming parents and friends to the Sunday School, emphasizing the children's place in the House of God, and telling what progress the School has made since last it gathered to keep Children's Day.

I venture to give three poems of my own, any one of which would be appropriate for a recitation at Children's Day service. They were all written for children, and can be easily learned.

I Wouldn't Be Cross

I WOULDN'T be cross, dear; it's never worth while.
Disarm the vexation by wearing a smile,
Let hap a disaster, a trouble, a loss,
Just meet the thing boldly, and never be cross.

I wouldn't be cross, dear, with people at home.
They love you so fondly: whatever may come,
You may count on the kinsfolk around you to stand
O, loyally true is a brotherly band!
So since the fine gold far excelleth the dross,
I wouldn't be cross, dear; I wouldn't be cross.

I wouldn't be cross with a stranger—ah! no.
To the pilgrims we meet on the life-path we owe
This kindness: to give them good cheer as they pass,
To clear out the flint stones and plant the soft grass
No, dear, with a stranger, in trial or loss,
I perchance might be silent: I wouldn't be cross.

No bitterness sweetens: no sharpness may heal
The wound which the soul is too proud to reveal.
No envy hath peace: by a fret and a jar
The beautiful work of our hands we may mar.
Let happen what may, dear, of trouble and loss,
I wouldn't be cross, love: I wouldn't be cross.

The Bishop and the Baby

A POOR little pale-faced baby,
Lost and hungry and cold,
With the chill wind pinching her tear wet cheeks
And ruffling her bright hair's gold.

For just when the busy people
Were hurrying here and yon,
Buying their gifts for the Christmas tree,
Her mother was suddenly gone.

She did not cry, poor midget,
But lifted pitiful eyes
At the crowds of careless strangers,
At the gray, indifferent skies.

Jostled and pushed and frightened,
A tiny waif of the street,
With the wintry darkness falling,
And the snow-flakes gathering fleet.

She was seen by a great, kind giant;
With swinging stride he came.
Even then the angels in heaven
Wrote Saint before his name.

From the height of his splendid stature
He stooped to the little maid,
Lifted her up in tender arms,
And bade her not be afraid.

Against this broad breast nestled,
She clung like a soft spring flower
That a breeze had caught and carried
To a strong and sheltering tower.

In his thick warm coat he wrapped her,
The little shivering child
"I'll find your mother, baby,"
The bishop said, and smiled

That smile like a flash of the sunrise—
'Tis but a memory dim,
For the years are hastening onward,
And we are mourning him.

The white, cold snows are drifting
Where to day he lies asleep.
After a life's long warfare
The soldier's rest is deep.

But of dear things said about him,
Of victories that he won,
No sweeter tale is told than this,
Of his grace to a little one.

God's Great Plan

"WHAT can be the use," said a fleecy cloud,
"Of these few drops that I hold?
They will hardly bend the lily proud
If caught in her chalice of gold.
But I, too, am part of God's great plan,
So my treasures I'll give as well as I can."

A child went merrily out to play,
But a thought, like a silver thread,
Kept winding in and out all day
Through the happy, golden head
"Mother said, 'Darling, do all that you can,
For you are a part of God's great plan.'"

She knew no more than the twinkling star,
Or the cloud with its raincup full,
How, why, or for what all strange things are.
She was only a child at school.
But she thought: "'Tis a part of God's great plan
That even I should do all that I can."

So she helped another child along.
When the way was rough to his feet,
And she sang from her heart a little song
That we all thought wondrous sweet:
And her father—a weary, toil worn man—
Said: "I, too, will do the best I can."

NOVEL READING

WHEN the older readers of this paper were young, novel reading was frowned upon by their parents and teachers as a waste of precious time, as a frivolous occupation, and as apt to give false views of real life. The last objection was strenuously and vehemently urged. That novels were works of the highest literary form, and that by their means right lessons might be inculcated, and pictures of current manners shown, had not dawned upon the conscientious readers of a former generation.

Novels are not a modern invention. Fiction is not the product of the era that now is, or of the era that has recently closed. In every age the story-teller has had pre-eminence in popularity, and has had the right of way at the camp-fire, on the journey, and around the hearth.

In our times, story writing has attained a rank equivalent to aristocracy among the makers of books. He or she who writes a story in which the plot is intricate, yet not impossible, the characters true to life, and the situations attractive, is sure of a wide and attentive circle of readers.

We love to be amused. Sometimes we ask escape from actualities of pain and anxiety into a realm of fancy and poetry. The world of imagination offers us a retreat from the sordidness of fact, a relief from the daily grind. A novel that is indelicate, malicious, or the vehicle of infidelity, nobody should read. A pure, bright, high-toned, and high-hearted story, even though sensational, will do its readers good. Is not life sensational? Why shall the tenor be wholly opprobrious when applied to a book?

That novel-reading should be for relaxation and not for serious occupation, almost goes without saying. We cannot thrive on sweetmeats and bon-bons. Yet there are novels that tax one's reasoning powers and fix one's profoundest thought, and these are not to be undervalued. A cultivated person must read in many fields; novels are not to be avoided, though one chooses essays, science, travels and history as the literature of his preference.

THE AMEER'S HAREM—AFGHANISTAN

Royalties in different parts of the world have different settings. An Oriental monarch with his harem, and its crowd of wives and their attendants, seems out of place in modern days. He, and it, and they, are alike anachronisms. Of the jealousies, rivalries, and squabbles, the surface-splendor and the constant quarrels in an Eastern harem, we of the West can form but a slight idea. But Solomon, who had the largest harem ever monarch had, left on record his conviction that it was better to live in the corner of the house-top alone, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.

A CAUTION

TO mention names in public conveyances, when talking with a companion, of persons who are absent, is an ill-advised as well as an ill-bred proceeding. The passenger opposite you in the ferry-boat or street car may happen to be the first cousin, or the intimate friend, or the nearest neighbor of the one about whom you are chatting, whose foibles you are ridiculing, or whose faults you are holding up to criticism. You would be greatly embarrassed if you knew that your unkind, or even your good-natured comments had an auditor who recognized their subject, and you would be distressed at the bare possibility that your remarks might be repeated.

Never mention names when talking in public, or in a social gathering where your fellow-guests are unknown to you. This rule is imperative.

In Behalf of the Conductor

Few people are so saintly as not to feel irritation when the conductor, in his brusque way, calls out "Step lively," when they leave a car. Putting ourselves in the man's place, and remembering that he runs his car on schedule time, that he has many delays on which he cannot count, and that his value to the road depends somewhat on his promptness, we can easily find excuses for his urgency addressed to the departing passenger. If this individual is crippled or aged or infirm, "Step lively" is an outrage; but if he is simply a dawdler or a laggard, the conductor has some reason on his part. The form of speech is doubtless objectionable, but every one has not a choice vocabulary, and the phrase has come down from a past, when the public was more long-suffering than it is to-day.

THE HEART OF THE WORLD

CHAPTER XI AND XII—Concluded

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

AUTHOR OF "IN HIS STEPS"

BRANDON boasted a new theatre building, erected at a cost of seventy-five thousand dollars, and catering largely to the new mill element. The night of Mrs. Lynde's appearance the building was packed to the roof.

The play was both sensational and questionable. The acting was indifferent, even bad, from every standard except Mrs. Lynde's. She really possessed large histrionic power, and knew how to thrill an audience as much by her acting as by her unquestioned beauty. Those who were there that night acknowledged the marvelous charm of her presence. Many spoke of it after the event of that night had become less vivid in its horror. She came and went looking like a person without a sin or fault. She was the wronged and injured one. Her tears fell naturally and sympathetically to the accompaniment of the orchestra, and their realism affected hundreds of the mill operatives, many of whom carried from that evening's acting a firm belief that Mrs Wrightam had been a most abused and ill-treated woman.

Into the midst of a climax in the third act, an odor of burning wood startled the members of the orchestra. The leader let his baton fall to the floor, and ran towards the little door under the stage. Before he reached it a wave of white smoke drifted across the footlights, and the whole theatre, from wings and stage entrances, seemed to burst into flame with a miraculous rapidity. Then arose that maddening cry of fire. It turned the audience into senseless animals, fighting for life. The gallery stairways became choked with bodies. Scores were found afterwards, suffocated in the passage, only a few feet from the wide open doorways. It was an insane, wild beast mob, each member of it caring for nothing except his own escape.

Wrightam had been going over the mill situation with Harwood that evening. They were at the house, and Harwood had repeated a statement about Harvey's real ability to face a coming crisis for the mill management, when Wrightam said, "Hark! Wasn't that the fire-alarm?"

They went to the window, and the glow of the fire showed over the housetops. "It's down on the street. Shall we go down?" Wrightam said, and Harwood nodded.

When they reached the theatre, the police were trying to hold the people back. Wrightam went at once to the chief and said, "My wife is in there." The next minute he was climbing in a window at the rear of the building. As he jumped down into the smoking darkness, he felt Harwood beside him.

There was not a word exchanged between them, but they acted deliberately, and as if by spoken concert. The theatre was blazing through the stage and the back part of the roof. The two men had entered a narrow passage-way leading to the greenroom. It was almost the only part of the building which was as yet untouched. The firemen were in different parts of the theatre, and Wrightam could see and hear them as they fought the flames or helped rescue the unfortunates still clinging to the balcony of the upper lobby.

The smoke was so dense, that Wrightam got down and crawled on hands and knees towards the stage. Several bodies were at the foot of the greenroom entrance. In the awful half-light he tried to find if any of these forms was that of his wife. Suddenly the greenroom door, which opened inward at the top of the short flight of stairs, was burst from its hinges, and two men, howling and fighting together, struggled through the narrow entrance, treading in complete indifference upon the faces and bodies of the prostrate ones that choked the passage. At the same time, the entire greenroom seemed to explode, with a shock, into flame. The smoke rolled up and was apparently transformed into billows of fire, and in the middle of the room, from which she had risen as if suddenly aroused out of some deadly trance, stood Mrs. Wrightam, her dress beginning to burn and the terror of madness on her face.

Wrightam leaped up and past the cursing, struggling figures in the doorway, crying, "Amy! Amy!" She heard him, and ran screaming to him. A blazing fragment of timber fell from the ceiling and smote her down, just at the moment her husband caught her. Harwood helped raise the figure, and extinguished the fire on her dress, and then, scorched, blinded, gasping, they succeeded in getting her to the window and outside. The back wall crashed in as they were carrying their burden farther from the building to a place of safety. They all sank down for the time insensible. Kindly hands helped them into an adjoining house, and Wrightam and Harwood were able by morning to care for themselves.

Wrightam painfully hobbled into the room where his wife had been carried. He found a pitiful figure, semi-conscious, disfigured, tortured with mental and physical agony from which he shrank, as if from a blow.

A week later he knew, with her, the worst. It had been possible to move her to his house. The nervous shock had resulted in a curious mingling of loathing for herself and hatred of God.

He told her the truth, as she insisted on knowing it. She would lose one eye. Her famous beauty was destroyed at a blow. The scars left by the burning of her hands and arms would disfigure her for life.

When she had listened to what she had forced him to say, she suddenly attempted to tear the bandage from her face. He prevented her from accomplishing her purpose, but not before she had partly succeeded, and fainted away under the self-inflicted torture. After that, either Mr. Wrightam or Eileen was with her day and night. She finally yielded to the unexpected horror of her future with a sullen despair. For weeks she never spoke. Wrightam surrounded her with every mark of affection. She watched him with cold and critical aspect, and Wrightam grew to think her absolutely heartless.

At last, one day, after weeks of heart-breaking forbearing, he saw a tear on her rough, scarred cheek. It was God's tear, the first this proud woman had shed in years. It was the beginning of the end. That night Wrightam could kneel and thank the Father for softening her heart. And oh, how his own heart leaped up one day yet later on, when she suddenly drew his face down, and almost fiercely demanded why and how he could care for such a wreck as she had become.

"I never loved you more truly than at this moment," he said with an honest glow of his transfigured face that she could not doubt. She broke down under it all. Love conquered her. There was no future for her except in that. Along any other track lay madness, darkness, death. Alfred, her boy, had left her shortly after the letter Wrightam had written. He is not a part of this chronicle. But for her now there was nothing left but love, and by God's grace she found that harbor, and in its peace she grew content to spend the rest of her days. And that is a history by itself that someone, sometime, should write for the encouragement of souls who have been smitten in like manner.

But out of this burning came another opportunity for Wrightam. Harvey had nearly lost his life that night. Two of his most trusted and capable superintendents did lose theirs. During all the time Mrs. Wrightam was fighting her way towards the liberty and sweetness of love, Harvey, who had been caught by the panic-smitten crowd on the stairway, was slowly recovering, always to bear about with him a disabled body. His spirit was fierce and untamed as ever. Stanton came over to Brandon and found Harvey writhing over the prospect, unreconciled to the future, bearing the burden of the mill management with a grim stoicism which did not deceive Stanton in the least.

"The mill is going to the dogs. Harwood has been in to tell me of things. But somehow, I'll make it yet."

Stanton shook his head. "I have had a talk with Harwood. Matters are worse than you suppose. The whole thing needs a head. You won't be able to get around for months yet."

Harvey groaned, but protested, and at last gave up to Stanton's suggestion.

"Here is Wrightam. Ask him to help you to straighten things out. He has wonderful ability. There isn't another living man who knows how to manage like him."

"Ask him to come over then, before you go back to Lenox," said Harvey, who did not want to be alone with Wrightam.

So Stanton went over and told Wrightam what the situation was. Wrightam went back with him to see Harvey. Harvey greeted him at first stiffly, but before an agreement was reached, he had thawed out perceptibly.

Wrightam was to undertake the entire supervision of the plant, and choose his own superintendents. He was to have liberty in the matter of meetings with the men and use whatever religious influence he could to shape their purposes. Harvey was incredulous. But Wrightam insisted, that only on condition that he be given a free hand would be undertake the management, and with this clear understanding he began the greatest work of his life.

How well he did that work let Fredrick Stanton relate. Another year had slipped by since the theatre fire. It was the Christmas week. On Harvey's invitation, Stanton had gone over to Brandon to be present at the profit-sharing meeting. Stanton had spent three days with Harvey and Wrightam. On his return he told Mildred the story of that year's work.

"It is almost beyond belief, Mildred. If I had not seen McAndrew's co-operative stores in Raleigh, England, I would have said a miracle had been wrought. Wrightam has a wonderful hold on the men. There is not one of them, Slav, Scandinavian, Irish, Hungarian, Italian, who does not swear and pray by Wrightam. Every morning the men assemble in the big hall over the machine shops, and Wrightam has a ten-minute service into which he packs the love of his soul for those men. You should see him. His eyes glow, his face is transfigured, his whole being shines with the love of Christ. It is a passion with him to save those men, not only industriously but spiritually. The men trust him implicitly. His salary has been the same as the wages of any man in the shops who is working at skilled labor. The first year's experiment proved the possibility of the co-operative plan even under a great handicap of mismanagement. It can be done. The dividends this season were fifteen per cent. of the wages. By the common arangement agreed upon at the beginning, superintendent, foremen and workmen share equally in the profits and losses. Wrightam does not claim that this is the only or best method; but he does claim, with Harvey, that by this method the men have been unified and a spirit of Brotherhood has been established, such as they never knew before.

"But the great thing about Wrightam's management is the religious grip on the whole affair. That ten-minute service every morning put its stamp on the whole thing. I saw tears in men's eyes that were worth more than a million dollars a year to them and to Wrightam. He is absolutely correct when he says that the whole Labor question will never be settled right until it is settled on the basis of a genuine love of man. His remarkable powers of organization and leadership, that once made him the dreaded captain of industry, are now consecrated to leading Labor into the higher and better way of God's service. And at the heart of it all beats one of the truest, tenderest hearts that God ever regenerated for his glory."

"How about Mrs. Wrightam?" asked Mildred.

"I saw her a few minutes. She is so changed you would not know her. People say her beauty is gone. In place of it there is something better. I believe she is not far from the Kingdom of God. She reverences her husband, and is apparently reconciled to her new life. She struck me as one who had a profound feeling of unspeakable relief to be surrounded by a perfect affection."

"And Eileen?"

"Eileen is a splendid girl. By the way, Arthur Harwood seems to feel perfectly at home there at Wrightam's. I ventured to speak to Wrightam about him, and he smiled and said he should not discourage a co-operative union in that direction. Arthur has capabilities, and is logically in the line of succession after Wrightam."

"And Harvey?"

"Well, Harvey is broken a great deal. He has never recovered from the injuries received at the fire. Sometimes I think he is not far from the Kingdom, either. One morning, while Wrightam was talking, Harvey sat on the platform, his great dark eyes fixed on Wrightam with a wistful look, as if he envied Wrightam the power he possesses over men. When the service closed Harvey took up his crutches and hobbled down and shook hands with Stollwitz who is foreman in the casting-room now. Stollwitz returned his grasp heartily, and I heard him say to Harvey:

The Strangest of all Revivals

Incidents of the Great Awakening in Wales Discussed by Rev. G. Campbell Morgan

TO a vast andience in Westminster Chapel, on a recent Sunday evening, Rev. G. Campbell Morgan gave his impressions and observations of the great Welsh revival, the leader of which is Evan Roberts, a poor young student. Mr. Morgan said: "Evan Roberts' addresses are punctuated perpetually by song and prayer and testimony. And Evan Roberts works on that plan, never hindering any one. I venture to say that if that address Evan Roberts gave in broken fragments that afternoon had been reported, the whole of it could have been read in six or seven minutes. As the meeting went on, a man arose in the gallery and said, 'So and So,' naming some one, 'has decided for Christ,' and then in a moment the song began. They did not sing 'Songs of Praises,' they sang 'Diolch Iddo,' and the weirdness and beauty of it swept over the audience. It was a song of praise because that man was born again. There are no inquiry rooms, no penitent forms, but some worker announces, or an inquirer openly confesses Christ, the name is registered, and the song breaks out, and they go back to testimony and prayer.

"Evan Roberts is hardly more than a boy, simple and natural, no orator, no leader of men; nothing of the masterfulness that characterised such men as Wesley, and Whitefield, and Moody; no leader of men. I do not hesitate to say that God has set his hand upon the lad, beautiful in simplicity, ordained in his devotion, lacking all the qualities that we have looked for in preachers, and prophets, and leaders. He has put him in the forefront of this movement that the world may see that he does choose the things that are not to bring to nought the things that are, the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty; a man who lacks all the essential qualities which we say make for greatness, in order that through him, in simplicity and power, he may move to victory.

"In connection with the Welsh revival there is no preaching, no order, no hymn-books, no choirs, no organs, no collections, and, finally, no advertising. Now, think of that for a moment again, will you? Think of all our work. I am not saying these things are wrong. I simply want you to see what God is doing. There were the organs, but silent; the ministers, but among the rest of the people, rejoicing and prophesying with the rest, only there was no preaching. Yet the Welsh revival is the revival of preaching to Wales. Everybody is preaching. No order, and yet it moves from day to day, week to week, county to county, with matchless precision, with the order of an attacking force. No books, but ah me! I nearly wept to-night over the singing of our last hymn. Mr. Stead was asked if he thought the revival would spread to London, and he said, 'It depends upon whether you can sing.' He was not so wide of the mark. When these Welshmen sing, they sing the words like men who believe them. They abandon themselves to their singing. We sing as though we thought it would not be respectable to be heard by the man next to us. No choir, did I say? It was all choir. And hymns! I stood and listened in wonder and amazement as that congregation on that night sang hymn after hymn, long hymns, sung through without hymn-books. Oh, don't you see it? The Sunday School is having its harvest now. The family altar is having its harvest now. The teaching of hymns and the Bible among those Welsh hills and valleys is having its harvest now. No advertising. The whole thing advertises itself. You tell me the Press is advertising it. I tell you they did not begin advertising it until the thing caught fire and spread.

"What is the origin of the movement? In the name of God let us all cease trying to find it. Let us cease trying to trace it to any one man. Whence has it come? All over Wales, a praying remnant have been agonizing before God about the state of the beloved land, and it is through that the answer of fire has come. If you and I could stand above Wales, looking at it, you would see fire breaking out here, and there, and yonder, and somewhere else, without any collusion or prearrangement. It is a Divine visitation.

"It is a Church revival. What I am looking for is that there shall come a revival breaking out in all our regular Church life. The meetings are held in the chapels, all up and down the valleys, and it began among Church members, and when it touches the outside man it makes him into a Church member at once. Within five weeks 20,000 joined the Churches. I think more than that have been converted, but the Churches in Wales enrolled during five weeks 20,000 new members.

"A friend of mine went to one of the meetings, and he walked down to the meeting with an old friend of his, a deacon of the Congregational Church, a man whose piety no one doubted, a man who for long years had worked in the life of the Church in some of its departments, but a man who would never think of speaking to men about their souls, although he would not have objected to some one else doing it. As my friend walked down with the deacon, the deacon said to him, 'I have eighteen young men in an athletic class of which I am president. I hope some of them will be in the meeting to-night.' There was a new manifestation. Within fifteen minutes he left his seat by my friend and was seen talking to a young man down in front of him. Presently the deacon rose and said, 'Thank God for So and So,' giving his name, 'he has given his heart to Christ right here.' In a moment or two he left him, and was with another young man. Before that meeting closed, that deacon had led every one of those eighteen young men to Jesus Christ, who never before thought of speaking to men about their souls.

"Let us in our Church work, prayerfully take hold of every organization and every method, and strengthen it. Strengthen it how? By seeing to it that through the organization the Spirit of God has right of way; by bringing your Sunday School class into a new realm, and instead of treating it as a company of boys and girls you care for very much, that you teach and interest on Sunday afternoons, treat it as a company of souls to be saved. Begin to try and teach along that line, instead of treating our congregations as congregations to be instructed ever in holy things; treat them as men and women that are to be persuaded to holy things, and consecration, and Jesus Christ. And in order to the doing of all this, what we supremely need is that we ourselves should be at the end of ourselves, that we should dare to abandon ourselves with some amount of passion to our work. Oh, we have been too

> Icily regular, faultily faultless,
> Splendidly null.

"What we do need is the abandonment of ourselves to the great truths we know so well, to the great forces that indwell. 'Let us strengthen the things that remain.'"

Revival Notes

—J. W. Helmuth, Belleville, Wis., writes: "I am now holding revival meetings, and in thirteen nights, nineteen persons have decided for Christ."

—Evangelist W. E. Stephens closed a series of meetings at the Atlantic Avenue Chapel, Brooklyn, recently, with thirty professed conversions as a result. They boldly and openly confessed the Lord Jesus as their Saviour, and nearly all united with the church.

—At New London, Conn., a series of revival meetings have been held under the leadership of Rev. E. E. Davidson. Five churches united in a work of four weeks or longer. The largest church in town, seating about 1,700, was filled to overflowing. Many came forward at the invitation to take a definite stand for Christ.

—Ninety-five persons, all except six on profession of faith, united with the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Sabbath morning, February 12, the congregation's first communion in their new edifice. This church has received nearly seventeen hundred new members during the seven years' pastorate of Rev. Dr. S. Edward Young.

—Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, of the Door of Hope, New York, writes: "I have just returned from a Western trip. Held about twenty-two services, the most wonderful, I think, I ever had. Such enormous crowds at Denver, Cincinnati and Dayton. Numbers were turned away. In one service alone over 250 came forward for prayer, and hundreds of hands were raised to be remembered."

—At Edgerton, Minn., a most successful series of revival meetings closed lately. They were held under the united auspices of the Congregational and M. E. Churches. Rev. A. S. Willoughby, pastor of the Congregational Church, and Rev. C. A. Sharp, pastor of the M. E. Church, conducted the services. A chorus choir of forty voices was organized. Both churches worked together, visiting and praying in nearly every home in the city, and also in places of business, and in homes in the country nearby. Over one hundred adults signed cards, which said, "I want to take Jesus as my Saviour and to love and serve him forever." Twenty-five children also signed cards.

Called Higher

Passed from this life, on Feb. 15, at her home, 152 Cole Street, Jersey City, Mrs. C. A. Hulse, in the eighty-fourth year of her age, Miss Maude Livesay was born June 5, 1890, in the town of Elsie, Mich. She died on Jan. 9, 1905, in the home where she was born. Her life was one of singular loveliness, and during her long illness, expressed her belief in the beauty and happiness of the future life. She was a devoted Christian, and as she grew weaker in body, her spirit grew in brightness and faith.

Elizabeth Ann Mull, wife of Edgar Schoonmaker, died July 27, at her home in Aquetuck, N. Y., in her sixty-seventh year. Mrs. Schoonmaker was superintendent of a Sunday School, to which she was most devoted, being absent but one Sunday in five years.

CONCLUDED FROM PRECEDING PAGE

"'Brudder Harvey, ven will you gif your heart to the Lord mit von whole surrender, eh?'

"I did not hear Harvey's reply; but I knew he was deeply affected, for his eyes were glistening as he went out."

Stanton sat silent, looking into the fire. The happy holiday greetings of some passers-by outside the house reached them; and the hurrying feet on the crisp snow passed on. The world still lay in the hand of God, and he had not forgotten it. The tall chimneys at Lenox and Brandon, would all alike be smokeless to-morrow; for it was a holiday. The strife would be resumed afterwards; and greed and conflict, and man against man, and man for himself would sway the passions of the world's commerce. Capital would hug to itself selfish gains, and cheat itself with its false happiness, and Labor would suffer and sin and struggle to reach happiness along the same track that Capital failed to find it, yet over all this world of warring interests between the men of money and the men of muscle, brooded the Brotherhood. Fredrick Stanton and Mildred his wife, sat together that evening and watched the fire glow, in the faith that was always a vision of better things farther on, and Stanton murmured again, "It is true. Wrightam has seen the Christ. The heart of the world is love. There is no answer to all questions between men like that. Nothing is ever settled right until it is settled by that test. God grant to the world the vision, in large measure." And Mildred, his wife, whispered, "Amen."

HIS BURDEN LIFTED

The Story of a Wonderful Conversion Told in The Bowery Mission

THERE are some thrilling testimonies given on the Bowery Mission platform, and they are not always from the Mission's own converts. Frequently, some visitor will rise and give evidence of Christ's power to save, in other and totally different circumstances from those surrounding our own Bowery men.

D. M. COOPER

Such a testimony fell from the lips of Mr. D. M. Cooper, of Homer, N. Y., a few evenings ago. Mr. Cooper, with his wife, was paying a business visit to the city, and being regular readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, they came to see the Mission. During their stay in the city, these two earnest Christian people were found upon the Mission platform every evening. Mr. Cooper is an exceedingly quiet and reserved man, but noticing his interest in our meetings, I ventured at last to ask him to speak. Little did I dream that such an interesting story would be told. Here it is:

Mr. Cooper was born in Russia in 1863, the son of a learned Jewish Rabbi, who still lives. His father was so anxious that his son should also be a Rabbi, that the boy early in life was placed under the strictest discipline, and compelled to study the Old Testament. At sixteen he became a teacher in a Jewish synagogue. Notwithstanding his position, he became involved in very serious mental difficulties, which became more intense as the years went on, until, at the age of twenty-eight, he became known as a believer in a kind of reformed Judaism, being a mixture of pantheism and atheism. "In short," said he, "I was an infidel."

About this time he came to America, and going into business at Homer, entered for the first time a Protestant family. These people took him to their church, and presented him with a copy of the New Testament in Hebrew. It was the first he had ever seen. It thrilled him. The teaching of Christ captivated him, and the Sermon on the Mount, especially, impressed him. He set himself to watch the lives of the Christians around, to see if they squared with the teachings they professed to follow. He found they did not, and he was shocked.

He fell back upon his former teachings of philosophy—that education and science were the only means to make men better, morally and physically. He studied Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall and other scientific writers. He plunged into Unitarianism. He went through the terrible struggle of Paul, in the seventh chapter of Romans. He yearned to be good. He resolved to live purely, but he found his resolutions swept away, as straw before a fire.

Then he was taken down into the valley of affliction. His wife died and left him with five orphaned children. Soon afterward he also sickened and rapidly failed. He was told by his physician that he might soon die. He was in great anguish of soul. For the first time in his life he realized that he was a sinner. He felt he was going down into an unknown world, carrying an awful burden of guilt. A great darkness rested upon him. At this time he was visited by the Rev. B. W. Hamilton, D.D., pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was expected to die at any moment. He felt himself to be dying. The minister asked him if he had ever accepted Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour. He said, "No," and, feeble as he was, attempted to bring up some of his old ideas as a reason for not doing so. Then the minister prayed, and during the prayer the poor sufferer sobbed aloud; but there was no relief; his sufferings of body and mind increased to such an extent that he decided to take his own life.

One of the neighbors visited him. To him he told of the deep grief of his soul. The reply was "the only remedy I know is a personal acceptance of Jesus Christ." But he cried out wildly: "How can I accept Him when I do not believe in Him?" And the darkness continued. The "tortures of hell" had taken hold upon him. His struggle was more like that of a madman than anything else. This is how Mr. Cooper concluded his touching story:

"I was awakened about midnight with a heavy pressure upon me. My agony was at its height; my doom seemed inevitable. To all appearances my last hour had come. I cried out, 'O God, have mercy upon me!' I prayed until half-past two, then began to feel easier. I felt a change coming over me. I stopped praying for a time. I wondered at my feelings, and was powerless to explain them. Just then, in the quietness of that hour, I seemed to hear a voice saying, 'Why do you not accept Christ as your personal Saviour?' I was so amazed and overwhelmed with wonder that I held my breath for a few seconds to find out if I were really awake and had heard a voice, or if it were only a dream. Assuring myself that I was awake, I replied, in answer to this voice, 'Lord, I do accept thee as my personal Saviour,' and then asked, 'Will my sins be forgiven?' To my surprise I seemed again to hear a voice. Men, you may believe me, or not; I cannot blame you if you do not believe me, for I, two years ago, should not have believed such a statement. But I heard as plainly as though the words had been spoken, the assurance, 'Your sins are forgiven.' At that moment the heavy load that had weighed upon me, the darkness that hung over me like a pall, the anguish of mind I was experiencing, were all taken away. A tranquility of soul came over me. I was at peace with God. I had found Christ, the Saviour of the world. I had tasted of the Water of Life, and was made every whit whole. My sickness left me. God raised me up, and I live to-day, a living witness to all my Jewish brethren, and to all the world, that there is none other name under heaven whereby we can be saved, except the name of Christ, the Son of the living God."

Thy Will Be Done!

YESTERDAY, when I said: "Thy will be done!"
I knew not what that will of Thine would be,
What clouds would cast their shadows o'er my way,
What storms would gather dark across my path.
I knew Thy love would give me what was best,
And I am glad I did not know the rest.

This morning, praying: "As it is in heaven,"
I did not dream what heavenly joy would come,
Before the purple shadows of the e'en,
To set its seal of blessing on my home.
But all day long my watching eye could see,
Thy gift of gladness coming near to me.

"Thy will be done!" I say. And to the scroll
Of unread years, consenting, set my name,
Day after day, its pages will unfold
In gracious gifts, that prove Thy love the same
Until the unmeasured years, eternal, sanctified.
Thy will be done! ANON.

4 Per Cent. and Safety

FROM all parts of the world this bank receives money for deposit.

Recently, a single day's mail brought $20,000 from a business man in Kansas, $1,000 from an army officer in the Philippines, $200 from a storekeeper in Russia, and $1 each from a school-girl in Ohio and a workingman in New York. It is all here for them any time they want it—and in the meantime it is earning 4 per cent interest, compounded every six months.

Department G booklet tells some interesting things about this bank and its banking-by-mail system.

EASY CHANGE

When Coffee Is Doing Harm

A lady writes from the land of cotton of the results of a four years' use of the food beverage—hot Postum Coffee:

"Ever since I can remember we had used coffee three times a day. It had a more or less injurious effect upon us all, and I myself suffered almost death from indigestion and nervousness caused by it. I know it was that, because when I would leave it off for a few days I would feel better. But it was hard to give it up, even though I realized how harmful it was to me.

"At last I found a perfectly easy way to make the change. Four years ago I abandoned the coffee habit and began to drink Postum, and I also influenced the rest of the family to do the same. Even the children are allowed to drink it freely as they do water. And it has done us all great good. I no longer suffer from indigestion, and my nerves are in admirable tone since I began to use Postum Coffee. We never use the old coffee any more. We appreciate Postum as a delightful and healthful beverage, which not only invigorates but supplies the best of nourishment as well." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

A Siamese Boy's Life-Work

By REV. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D.D.

WHEN Dr. Arthur H. Brown, the well-known Secretary of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, returned from his world tour, he reckoned among the most distinguished men he had met in any land, a young man in Siam, by name Boon Itt, who recently died. As he was a personal friend of the writer, and for years a member of the church of which he was pastor, in Waterford, N. Y., we feel prompted to put a few facts before the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which are fitted to stir up the young lads of America to make the most of life.

BOON ITT

Boon Itt was born in Bangkok, in 1865, and died in 1903. His father was a native of China, and his mother of Siam, but they were both earnest Christians; and the mother was, in fact, the first of the Siamese women to embrace Christianity, and became in that land the pioneer of woman's work. She was a graduate of a boarding-school, founded by the American missionaries in the Siamese capital, and afterward rose to be its matron. She became a teacher in the king's palace, the queen being her pupil.

It 1876, Doctor and Mrs. House, visiting their native land, brought with them two fine lads to be educated here. One of them was Kawn and the other Boon Itt.

Boon Itt early began to develop remarkable traits. He was converted, and became a member of the Presbyterian Church at Waterford. Through his four years at Williston Seminary, and another four at Williams College, he was one of the foremost, whether as an athlete or a student. Amid all his hard study, he always found time for Christian work. It was the great Mark Hopkins who drew him to this college, of whom the lamented Garfield used to say that a log with Mark Hopkins at one end and a student at the other would be a university. D. L. Moody was the attraction that drew Boon Itt to Northfield in summer vacation, to learn the higher arts of Bible study and soul-winning. After a theological course at Auburn, he was ordained a preacher. In 1893, he went back to Siam to work there for young men, being adopted by the Waterford church as their own missionary.

Thousands of bright young men were flocking to the Siamese capital, and feeling the quickening effect of foreign ideas, scores of young people were being educated in the mission schools. Boon Itt felt that here was an open door of usefulness, and he entered it without hesitation. He was peculiarly qualified for a leader—intellectually, morally and spiritually. Though he died before he was forty, his influence still lives. Already in the short time elapsing since his return to Bangkok, he had begun to shape and mould other characters. A movement is on foot to erect a suitable building to his memory. It will be dedicated to the work he began among the young people of Siam. This building will be fitted with a library, reading room, chapel and rooms for various other purposes, similar to model buildings of Young Men's Christian Associations at home. Land has been donated, and already the missionaries and young men of Bangkok have collected thousands of dollars toward the building.

Boon Itt in his short ten years' work in Pitsanuloke and Bangkok, made a deep impression upon the youth of Siam. His motto was: "Overcome evil with good." He saw there gambling-dens wasting money, fostering idleness and training thieves. Siam has no innocent and uplifting places of resort for young men, and his noble heart was like Paul's, stirred up and on fire in their behalf. One of his Siamese friends says: "The seed Boon Itt planted is becoming a tree; it is shooting forth its leaves and blossoms, and we shall soon see its fruit." "We will have," writes one of the young nobles, "innocent, health-giving sports, study of the Bible and other good literature."

There is nothing more noble than a beautiful manhood. All may not be great, but all may be good. The influence of one good man like Boon Itt, will go on spreading and expanding during the coming years.

Remembers the War of 1812

TO reach the age of a hundred and five years, and still be in possession of all the faculties that make life worth living, is granted to few. Yet such is the case with Mrs. Deborah Silliman, of Euston, Conn., who has recently celebrated her birthday at the home of her grandson. She was born in Fairfield, a short distance from Euston, and has lived all her life within five miles of that town. She remembers distinctly the excitement caused by the breaking out of the War of 1812, and how she used to accompany her father to the post-road from New York, to get the latest news from stage-drivers. She is thoroughly informed on all events of the day, and enjoys reading the daily papers. The war in the East has interested her greatly, and she has kept track of all the movements of the contending armies. It is interesting to think of the changes in warfare since she first got the news of Plattsburg, and New Orleans, when they fought with the "Brown Bess" (the old flintlock musket), to the present day of machine gun and magazine rifle.

MRS. SILLIMAN AT 105

She has little sympathy with the rush of the twentieth century, and recently refused a ride in an automobile, though she often goes for a ride in a carriage. She was fifty years old before the first railroad was built in Connecticut, so that she has been a witness of the entire commercial development of her State.

Stands in Front Rank

The second volume of Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts has just arrived by express. I cannot fully express my pleasure and satisfaction in obtaining such a collection of gems of thought. It stands well up in the front rank as an educator, and should be in the hands of every student in any branch of study. It is astonishing how you can furnish so rich a premium for so little money. It is a genuine multum in parvo. The Calendar is a gem in its line, and has greatly pleased our young folks.

The Writing of the New Testament*

THE Old Testament—that is, the Bible prior to the Advent—stood like a half-built temple, awaiting the coming of Christ to complete it.

But he wrote no portion of the New Testament with his own hand. He committed that work to his disciples as a sacred trust and gave them an abundant equipment for it. Observe that a considerable portion of his teaching was in merest outline. Some of the most important truths could, in the necessity of the case, be only hinted at. He said, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now" (John 16: 12). His use of parables is thus explained, "And with many such parables spake he the Word unto them, as they were able to hear it" (Mark 4: 33).

He made provision that such teaching as must be presented thus by himself should subsequently be filled out. It must be remembered that Jesus did not profess to complete his system of truth. Luke says he only "began to teach" (Acts 1: 1). His words were the substance of a revelation which was to be continued, formulated and completed by certain of his disciples, who were to write this further Scripture as they were moved by the Spirit of God.

To this end he specially endued them with the Spirit, and promised, "He shall guide you into all the truth" (John 16: 13); and again, "He shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you" (John 16: 26), and again, "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall bear witness of me; and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning" (John 15: 26, 27). The New Testament is simply the recorded testimony of these "witnesses."

And upon these writings our Lord placed the seal of divine authority in most explicit terms, saying, "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that rejecteth you rejecteth me; and he that rejecteth me rejecteth him that sent me" (Luke 10: 16). Here is food for reflection on the part of such as profess to find antagonism between the teachings of John or Paul or James and those of their divine Lord. It is simply fatuous for a professing Christian to say, "I accept the teachings of Christ, but not those of his apostles," when Christ himself said, with reference to their teachings, "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that rejecteth you rejecteth me."

*From The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Scriptures, by Rev. David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D. Pp. 211. Price 75 cents. Published by the American Tract Society, New York.

The Fifth Gospel†

YOU are acquainted with the four Gospels: the Gospel according to St. Matthew, and the Gospel according to St. Mark, and the Gospel according to St Luke, and the Gospel according to St. John. But there is another Gospel which is read in your circle a great deal more than any of these. It is the Gospel according to You; the interpretation of Jesus Christ, either for good or evil, which glows or glowers through your personality. And there are several respects in which your Gospel differs from any of these. In the first place, it is written in a universal tongue. It can be read by all.

Although a man may be so ignorant as not to be able to read these, no man is too ignorant to be able to read yours. A number of years ago a young fellow of the name of Wray, a student at Princeton College, applied for appointment as a foreign missionary. He was a thoroughly good man, but not very quick in respect to learning, and when he reached the field of his prospective labors, he found it difficult to master the language But though the simple natives could not understand his talk, they could understand his walk; and one day when they, according to the custom in those countries, were seated in a circle on the ground, listening to the instruction of one of their teachers, the question was asked, "What is it to be a Christian?" And none could answer. But finally one pointed to where this young man sat, and replied, "It is to live as Mr. Wray lives."

Not one of them could read the Gospel according to Matthew, or the Gospel according to Mark, or the Gospel according to Luke, or the Gospel according to John; but every one there could read the Gospel according to Wray. And your Gospel is written in a universal tongue. As St. Paul says in this text, it can be "known and read of all men." That means your office boy. He is reading it when you think he is only sweeping out the store, and you come in in the morning with a cross word or a kind one. That means your servant in the kitchen. She is reading it, when you do not think she is at all; and so are the children, and the neighbors. Your Gospel is written in a universal tongue.

Farm and Garden

Burpee's Farm Annual for 1905 is, as usual, a feast for the lovers of vegetables and flowers. The products of Burpee's "seeds that grow," are shown in a bewildering array, from cover to cover, of this attractive catalogue. From the seed gardens and trial grounds at Fordhook, come the most delicious looking fruits and vegetables, the most brilliant and luxuriant blossoms and shrubs, and ornamental plants. No description gives an adequate idea of the excellence and beauty of the succulent edibles and rare flora that Burpee sets forth in the 1905 hand-book, which says "Quality is the keystone of our success." The planter has the assurance that the seeds he buys of Burpee & Co. are really first class and true to name. It pays the planter to buy the best seeds. All seeds have been tested and tried at Fordhook Farms. W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Have you seen the glorious new callas, Rhemanni (pink), Elliottiana (yellow), shown on the cover of John Lewis Childs' 1905 Catalogue? This catalogue is the 30th anniversary edition, and is published in a most attractive form. The grouping of the magnificent callas on one cover, and of four of the earliest fruits on the other, are works of art in themselves, to say nothing of the possibilities opened up to those who are fruit growers for profit, and flower cultivators from love of the beautiful blossoms. The Childs' business, started in a small way thirty years ago, has built up an entire village—Floral Park—famous the world over as the home of one of the largest floral establishments. A special anniversary offer to patrons consists of five of the finest floral novelties and The Mayflower, a monthly magazine, for three years for twenty-five cents. A very beautiful flower seed novelty included in this offer is the Anniversary Salvia, a new dwarf form of Salvia Splendens, which will not be offered for sale until next year. John Lewis Childs, Floral Park, N. Y.

Peter Henderson & Co. are sending out a large square volume entitled, Everything for the Garden. It is comprehensive and attractive, containing a surprising amount of information and colored plates, many of which are fine enough for framing. This book is more than a catalogue, it is a handbook for garden, greenhouse, lawn, and farm, and is filled from cover to cover with interesting talk on the subjects of seeds, plants, bulbs, garden implements, requisites, fertilizers, insecticides, etc. An attractive feature among flower seeds, is the improved Ever-blooming Hollyhocks; these flowers, the first season, blooming from July until frost. A brilliantly colored engraving gives some idea of the gorgeousness of this new double hollyhock. Peter Henderson & Co., 35-37 Cortlandt Street, New York.

J. Roscoe Fuller & Co.'s Garden Annual for 1905, offers such a variety of our beautiful friends of the garden that one finds it difficult to choose. A description of the Japanese Imperial Morning Glory would almost incline one to grow nothing but these magnificent flowers, which are of exquisite beauty and coloring and enormous size, from 4 to 6 inches across, with innumerable markings and shadings. A new and rare beauty is the giant fringed yellow Morning Glory. Looking further, we find that we must reserve some space for other lovely plants, vines, and shrubs, especially the new Tree Strawberry and the white Iceberg Blackberry. The wonderful Japanese Kudsu vine is the most rapid-growing vine in existence, grows a foot a day, and is covered with a wealth of beautiful pink blooms. J. Roscoe Fuller & Co., Floral Park, N.Y.

A keen-eyed, smiling farmer, pictured on front cover of Northrup, King & Co.'s catalogue, holds up an ear of Peep o' Day Corn, as if he were inviting company in partaking of this early new variety of sweet corn. It comes ten days in advance of any other corn, and is the sweetest of all and the most productive. Here is a chance for boys to make money in planting an acre or half acre or vacant lot with this Peep o' Day Corn, and it will be surprising how fast the "sweet corn farm" product can be sold to people who really are hungry for good, sweet, fresh corn.

Among the novelties in flowers is the new mammoth flowering hybrid, the beautiful Wedding Flower (centaurœ imperialis), easy of culture, combining the bearing of the chrysanthemum and the lasting qualities of the aster; gorgeous in coloring and unrivalled as a cut flower. Northrup, King & Co., Minneapolis, Minn.

Saving Colombian War Waifs

OUR readers are already familiar with the missionary work of the Rev. and Mrs. Joseph Norwood in Venezuela and the South American Republic of Colombia. The society under which these faithful missionaries were working having given up its efforts in those countries for the time being, Mr. and Mrs. Norwood have returned to the United States.

A few days ago Mr. and Mrs. Norwood visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House. They were accompanied by four interesting little native Colombian children from their mission station at Bucaramanga, in that Republic. The group, which is shown in the photograph, consists of two boys and two girls. The larger of the two boys, Segundo Vera, and the smaller of the two girls, Mercedes Sanches, are half-brother and sister. Segundo's father died when he was an infant. A devastating war began in 1899 and lasted nearly four years, causing the death of nearly five per cent. of the population of the Republic of Colombia. It destroyed nearly all the crops in the greater part of the country, stagnated every industry, including commerce and mining, and reduced the paper currency to one cent on the dollar, as compared with American gold. At this time Segundo was about seven, and Mercedes one year old. A sanguinary battle of two days was fought, with the Sanches' home situated in the centre of the fiercest part of it. Everything they had was destroyed, and they barely escaped with their lives.

MR. AND MRS. NORWOOD
And their four little Colombian Charges

Lack of sanitary precautions caused a fearful epidemic to follow the battle, and the children's mother fell a victim. A few hours before her death, she sent her two children to Mrs. Norwood, with this message: "I can live only a few hours, and therefore send you my two little ones. I know you will not let them perish with hunger." They were received. A few weeks later it was learned that, in a battle, twenty-five miles from Bucaramanga, the father had been killed. "Hence," said Mr. Norwood, "these two bright children have been entirely dependent upon us for nearly five years.

"One lovely night in November, 1901," he continued, "when the ravages of war were still harrowing the people, and poverty and starvation were on every hand, a chubby boy infant of about eight months was discovered near the inner door, leading to the courtyard of our house. He was lying on some rags and crying from hunger. He was taken into our house by Mrs. Norwood, and warm milk was given him slowly. As his hunger was appeased, he looked into the kind faces around him, and cooed and smiled. As we knew no name for the little foundling, Mrs. Norwood called him by the name of her brother, Robert. We learned later that his name is Juan Evangelista Martinez."

An interesting and most pathetic story is that of the gentle-faced little girl, who looks out from the lower left-hand corner of the illustration. This child, at the age of five years, walked sixty miles with her grandmother to feed her starving uncle, a poor soldier of the Liberal army, who had been left behind by his comrades. His aged mother, who lived in San Gil, seventy miles away, learning of his condition, made the journey on foot, to bring him something to eat, and some medicines, and with her came the little orphan granddaughter. The city was so overrun by these "confinados," semi-prisoners of war, that—though the citizens were disposed to be very charitable—the amount for each individual was very small. During this time Mr. and Mrs. Norwood were giving one good meal daily to more than a hundred people on an average. This was only a drop in the bucket, but they could do no more. The old woman, after much suffering, finally succumbed, and was taken to the so-called asylum, and soon after found rest in the pauper's corner of the cemetery. The soldier-uncle brought his little niece to Mrs. Norwood and begged that the child be received into the missionaries' home. "Carmelita Garnica is one of the sweetest of all the children that I have ever known," said Mrs. Norwood, "and her understanding of the New Testament Scriptures is simply marvelous." All four of these children have bright intellects and pleasing dispositions, and all would have died long ago of starvation, as did hundreds there during the war, had it not been for the good missionaries who took them in and sheltered them in the Mission Home. In this work they were aided by many of the readers of this journal. A year ago there were still thirty-six children in the Norwood house. Twenty-seven of these were placed in private families after the effects of the Colombian war had, to some extent, passed away. Five of the remaining nine were placed in an asylum, and the group on this page shows the remaining four.

Old Friends

WE love each gray hair on their heads,
Each wrinkle in the face;
Each slowing movement has for us
A sweet pathetic grace.

We fondly stroke each faded cheek,
Nor aught of beauty miss;
With mingling reverence and love
The thin worn hands we kiss.

How wondrous sweet the smile can be
That beams from dimming eyes!
These dear old saints have surely caught
A halo from the skies! AMELIA HOYT.

UNCLE SAM'S HEAVY BURDEN

The most desirable thing to be hoped for during the next four years is that the Administration will dissolve the profit-sharing partnership existing between the Government and the legalized liquor traffic. This would deprive the traffic of its present dignity and protection as a government institution. It would aid in turning the fourteen hundred millions of dollars now spent annually for poisonous beverages into the channels of legitimate trade, which would greatly increase the demand for the useful industries and their products, such as clothing, food and shelter, for the now liquor-submerged tenth of our population. It would help to save from debauchery, moral ruin and eternal death, the 100,000 annual victims of the drink curse, and bring joy and happiness where there is now sorrow and misery.

Christianity in Work*

HOW can a man glorify God in his daily work? Some people imagine that to do so it is necessary to be always speaking of religion and to be interlarding ordinary conversation with pious platitudes and devout ejaculations. This is not the best way, and it is doubtful whether it glorifies God at all. The Christian ought to be ready at all times to give a reason for the hope that is in him and to testify to the benefit he derives from religion; but his best proof of piety is in deeds, rather than in words. It is in his general character, in his fidelity, kindness, patience, helpfulness, sympathy, that his Christianity makes itself felt. Men, as Christ said, see his good works, and glorify God.

The Christian may glorify God by being conscientious. His work should be thorough, whether he is observed or not. He should be known as a man who does not need to be watched. There are firms, whose goods do not have to be weighed or measured, when they are delivered; their character is a sufficient guarantee for honesty. There are workmen who are punctual at their tasks, careful in all that they do, concerned for the interests of their employers, diligent in every act and deed. There are trusted clerks, to whom no one would dream of offering a bribe, either for the disclosure of a secret or the betrayal of a confidence. When it is known that such men are Christians, the Christian character is honored and God is glorified. Every one admires such qualities, and if it were known that the Christian always had them, his religion would commend itself to the world. Every Christian has the honor of his faith in his keeping, and he should take care that never through his negligence or carelessness, shall it suffer reproach.

The difficulty of glorifying God in our daily work, is probably greater in our day than in any past time. The curse of competition is driving our business men into practices which undermine Christian character. The strenuous effort to make money no matter who suffers, is developing a selfish spirit which is antagonistic to the spirit of Christ. The millionaire merchant who adds another department to his business, and by the inducements he is able to offer succeeds in ruining the small dealer, and driving him out of business, is doing a cruel and bitter wrong. If it happens that he is known as a Christian, he brings reproach on the name of Christ. Instances have been known of business men being so anxious to offer bargains, that the seamstresses who work for them have been almost starved to death in their attempt to live on the wages paid for their work. Other cases have occurred of employees being so poorly paid, that they resorted to evil courses to obtain the common necessaries of life. Yet the employer is regular at church, and makes large gifts to the cause of Christ.

Of course in this wild race for wealth the public has its share of complicity. The Christian lady who succeeds in buying a garment below its value, encourages the merchant in his unchristian practices. She rejoices in her bargain, and has no sense of pity for the poor creature whose remuneration for making it was cut down, in order that it might be sold so cheap. Before we can glorify God in our daily work, we must have some sympathy with one another; we must discard our selfish ways and motives; and we must embody in our lives the love and consideration for others that Christianity enjoins.

One Woman's Task

Mrs. Ida McLean of Friend, Neb., writes: "I have undertaken the support of a missionary, eleven orphans and four native preachers and teachers in China and India. Perhaps a mother with four children and six of a family to work for, ought not to undertake so much, but some of my children are now old enough to help me, and we get along very nicely. We have raised a little over $2.000 for missions from the sale of flower seeds."

THE LIGHT OF LIFE

By MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Lord Jesus had repeatedly taught his disciples that the Son of Man must suffer many things and be re-jected of the chief priests and of the elders. The breach between these ecclesiastical and political leaders of the people and God's Messiah was continually widening, and his strong assertions as to his divine commission, divine origin, and divine kinship angered them more than ever. And when he said to them (John 8: 56), "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad," and in answer to their objection, made the statement, "Before Abraham was, I am," their indignation knew no bounds; "they took up stones to cast at him." But "his hour was not yet come;" he was not to be murdered, but executed. He must come to the cross if the sin of man should be atoned for. "And Jesus hid himself." Where? He went "through the midst of them," but their eyes were holden, and they saw him not, "and so he passed by."

"And as he passed by, he saw a man who was blind from his birth." Our beloved Lord was not so intent on his own safety as to have no eyes for the poor and man. This is a lesson to us never to be anxious. Men intent upon taking his life were left in the temple; he was leaving the temple to avoid them. On human lines it would have seemed most dangerous to stop just now; but all his actions were regulated from above, and he knew what he had to do.

The disciples were not at this time filled with the Holy Ghost, and so had not learned to look at all things in the light of God. "He shall teach you all things," our Lord said to his disciples. It was anything but the teaching of the Holy Ghost which made them say, "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" The flesh is very hard in its judgments. The heathen look upon sickness and misfortune as a sure sign that the sufferer is especially sinful, and here were disciples of Christ doing the same! No thought of sympathy or of compassion; the unfortunate and the sufferers were held in contempt. Our beloved Lord came to introduce another state of things. He had compassion. Jesus answered, "Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." If he has sinned, and if his parents have sinned, is it not in such a case that the works of God should be made manifest? God would teach us, if indeed we are learners in his school, taught of the Spirit to despair of no man, and to see in the most hopeless an opportunity that the works of God should be made manifest in them. Oh, how far are the most of us from this heart of compassion, and this faith in God for others! Our Lord said, "I must work the works of him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work." Oh to learn more fully that we, too, are privileged to do the works of Christ; he dwelling in us as the Father dwelling in him, did his works. When shall we learn to give up measuring ourselves against impossibilities, and learn to measure God against them; to take our right place of nothingness, and to give him his place as the Almighty, by trusting him implicitly.

"As long as I am in the world," he said, "I am the light of the world." In our measure, as members of the body of which he alone is the Head, we too, may say what he said of us: "As long as we are in the world we are the light of the world" (Matt. 5: 14; Eph. 5: 8; Phil. 2: 15). But how miserably poor our light is, because the thick coat of self-life upon the lantern hides the light which is within! When he had thus spoken, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay, and said unto him, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam. He went his way, therefore, and washed, and came seeing." Not a word to the poor man about his sin, his sickness, or his faith. "I am the Light of the World," he had just said, and he found the way to shine into this man's darkness if he was only obeyed.

The man simply did as he was told, and there was faith in his obedience; his faith was not in the clay, which doubly blinded his eyes, nor in the water of Siloam, for neither had ever been known to cure birth-blindness; his faith was in the absolute trustworthiness of Him who had said to him, "Go and wash."

The Civic Conscience

By WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN

GOD requires much of those to whom he gives much, and if our education has made us stronger, we hold that strength as trustees for those who are weaker. If our shoulders are broader, we must put those shoulders under heavier loads. The culture of this country is not doing its duty to-day. But, if I speak thus in a tone that might seem the tone of discouragement, let me tell you that I am not at all pessimistic. I think I can see evidence of it; the tide, which has been running in favor of great combinations of wealth that have sometimes overstepped the bounds, is beginning to turn.

Sometimes good men and good women, holding stock in lawless enterprises, have not understood their own responsibility of their partnership in the wrong-doing. We have heard men crying out against the little gambling house run on an alley, while they have been silent in regard to the great gambling houses that are run in your market places. We have been too much in the habit of finding fault with the fellow who sells his vote for five dollars, and overlooking the man who puts up $5,000 or $50,000 to buy the votes of a thousand or ten thousand men at five dollars apiece!

I think I see signs of an awakening. I was in Indiana the other day, and I found that the retiring Governor, in his message, had called attention to the corruption in his State. The incoming democratic Governor in Colorado did the same. The President is leading a forward movement, and the magazines are exposing the schemes and methods of those who prey upon society. I find here and there indications of awakening of the civic conscience, and I believe the time is coming when the cultured people of this country will arouse to their duty, and throw their mighty influence upon the side of pure government and more just conditions.

A Helping Word

SPEAK a helping word as you go—
Sympathy and kindness ever show;
Many hearts are hungering for cheer;
Speak to them a word of love sincere.

Speak a helping word, speak a helping word,
Speak a helping word on your way!
There are many, many chances to scatter loving glances
And speak a helping word on the way.

Speak a helping word every day—
You may save some brother gone astray;
You may hearten some who now despair,
Strengthen those who heavy burdens bear.

Speaking to the weak or to the strong,
Help the tempted ones to fight with wrong;
Hearts to grand endeavor may be stirred
Everywhere—oh, speak a helping word!

What Will You Give For

HEALTH AND A GOOD FIGURE?

Will you give me 15 minutes in your own home and get well without drugs?

—perfectly, completely well, with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which health and a well developed, symmetrically shaped body alone can give? There is nothing to withhold or circumscribe as health, vigorous, well-kept body sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and wield influence.

If the lungs, heart, nerves and every vital organ of the body are strong, there is no need of drugs or medicine. The permanent relief from weakness can only be in regaining the strength of weakened organs. It has been shown that about 9,000 out of the 15,000 druggists in the United States and probably fifty per cent. of the drugs contain morphine.

DRUGS ARE DANGEROUS

Any woman by practising fifteen minutes each day in her own room can have a good figure, clear skin, strong brain and the perfect health, poise and vivacity which results from a sound condition of all the vital functions. We women do not want large muscles, but we want that vibrant life for a basis of a healthful spirit which makes life worth living. We also want beauty, symmetrical, well rounded figures. With that graceful, dignified, easy carriage which denotes character, culture and refinement.

EVERY WOMAN CAN HAVE A CLEAR SKIN AND A GOOD FIGURE

My instructions by mail are strictly in rational and strength contributing. I direct the exercises, bathing and diet adapted to your condition and teach you how to breathe, how to stand, how to walk. I strengthen the stomach and the nerves so that your food will nourish you; strengthen the liver, kidneys and intestines so that all impurities are thrown from your system; stimulate a sluggish circulation, send the blood bounding through your veins, so that you feel warm and comfortable; put you in a condition to resist colds; strengthen weak hearts and lungs, relieve you of weaknesses, home backaches and headaches. When this is done, you will have a clear brain, a quick perception and a vibrant life force.

I HAVE HELPED 15,000 WOMEN TO HELP THEMSELVES

I wish you could read the mail on my desk for one day—it would make you happy as it does me. I am quoting to you below extracts from some letters from my pupils. Some of these names I have permission to give—others I have not—but I can duplicate any one of these extracts many times a day.

"The lump in my side which the doctors called a tumor has entirely disappeared and I am so happy, Miss Cocroft." "I weigh 8 pounds less and have gained wonderfully in strength." "My kidneys are much better." "My stomach does not bother me at all now. I can eat anything." "Just think of it! To be relieved from constipation. Entirely free after having it for thirty years." "The rheumatism has disappeared and I sleep such a restful sleep." "Have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of good, quiet nerves." "I am delighted with the effect of the exercises upon my catarrh." "My bust has increased four inches in the past three months." "My weight has increased thirty pounds." "My eyes are stronger and I have taken off my glasses." "I have not had a sign of gall stones since I began your work."

I take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomen and Hips, build up Thin Necks and Chests and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds and hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you the names of women who have been relieved of above and other difficulties. I will send you an instructive booklet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this booklet and nothing for my information in regard to your case. Do not hesitate to write me. I hold pupils' letters in confidence.

Aid the Natural Changes

of the skin by using HAND SAPOLIO. If you want a velvet skin, don't PUT ON preparations, but TAKE OFF the dead skin, and let the new perfect cuticle furnish its own beauty. Those who use HAND SAPOLIO need no cosmetics—Nature, relieved, does its own work, and you will gain, or retain, a natural beauty that no balms or powders can imitate.

THE FIRST STEP away from self-respect is lack of care in personal cleanliness; the first move in building up a proper pride in man, woman, or child, is a visit to the bath-tub. You can't be healthy, or pretty, or even good, unless you are clean. USE HAND SAPOLIO. It pleases every one.

THE PERFECT PURITY of HAND SAPOLIO makes it a very desirable toilet article; it contains no animal fats, but is made from the most healthful of the vegetable oils. It is truly the "Dainty Woman's Friend." Its use is a fine habit.

WHY TAKE DAINTY CARE of your mouth, and neglect your pores, the myriad mouths of your skin? HAND SAPOLIO does not gloss them over, or chemically dissolve their health-giving oils, yet clears them thoroughly by a method of its own.

INSIST

Do it gently, wisely, but firmly.
Insist on having HAND SAPOLIO from your dealer. He owes it to you.

He may be slow—hasten him a bit!

He may be timid—don't blame him, he has often been fooled into buying unsalable stuff—tell him that the very name SAPOLIO is a guarantee that the article will be good and salable.

He may hope that you will forget it—that you do not want it badly—Insist, don't let him forget that you want it very badly.

He can order a small box—36 cakes—from any Wholesale Grocer in the United States. If he does, he will retain, and we will secure, an exceedingly valuable thing—your friendship.

JUST INSIST!

A BEAUTIFUL SKIN can only be secured through Nature's work. Ghastly horrid imitations of beauty are made by cosmetics, balms, powders, and other injurious compounds. They put a coat over the already clogged pores of the skin and double the injury.

WOULD YOU WIN PLACE? Be clean, both in and out.

We cannot undertake the former task—that lies with yourself—but the latter we can aid with HAND SAPOLIO.

It costs but a trifle—its use is a fine habit.

HAND SAPOLIO neither coats over the surface, nor does it go down into the pores and dissolve their necessary oils. It opens the pores, liberates their activities, but works no chemical change in those delicate juices that go to make up the charm and bloom of a healthy complexion. Test it yourself.

For Everybody at Home—HAND SAPOLIO

THE BABY, because it is so soft and dainty for its delicate skin.
THE SCHOOLBOY, because its use insures him "Perfect" marks in neatness.
THE "BIG SISTER," because it keeps her complexion and hands soft and pretty.
THE BUSY MOTHER, because it keeps her hands young and pretty in spite of housework and sewing.
THE FATHER himself, because it helps him to leave behind the grime of daily work, AND

Yourself BECAUSE IT KEEPS THE SKIN SOFT, REMOVES STAINS, AND AIDS THE NATURAL CHANGES OF THE SKIN.

Do You Want this Gem Roller Organ?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year and a GEM ROLLER ORGAN, with Three Tunes of Your Own Selection, Altogether for ONLY $3.00

EVEN A CHILD CAN PLAY IT

Incredible, Yet True!

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that, at last, it has fortunately secured a bargain, that, while almost incredible, must prove irresistible to its subscribers, who know from experience that it never promises a thing that it does not perform.

We have purchased the entire present stock—and subsequent output for many months to come—of the only manufacturers of the GEM Roller Organ, at a figure that enables us to make good the marvelous proposition which we publish at the head of this announcement, and we urg upon every reader to speedily avail himself of the exceptional advantages of this unusual and, indeed, unprecedented offe

What is the Gem Roller Organ?

It is a serviceable, durable instrument, operated with the aid of absolutely indestructible tunes, and so simple that any child, without the slightest knowledge of music, can produce any tune with the accuracy of an expert, and with a volume sufficient to fill an ordinary hall.

There are a thousand tunes to select from, and three of your own selection accompany each organ. Further tunes may be selected at the trifling expense of thirty cents each, delivered free; and as these roller tunes are absolutely indestructible, once purchased they will last a lifetime. There is nothing about them that will either crack or break.

Unlike other automatic organs, this instrument plays any number of verses consecutively, without interruption. There is no re-rolling or re-winding with awkward intermissions, but literally a "continuous performance" at the will of the operator.

The music is of every description, and one hundred specimen tunes are printed below. Every instrument is accompanied by a complete catalogue, from which, later on, you may select any tunes that you may wish to possess, at thirty cents each, delivered free.

Home Entertainments, Sunday Schools, Class-Meetings, Church Services, Lawn Parties and Picnics may be enlivened, and any person, old or young, without the faintest idea of music, may perform. The mechanism, the tunes, and the volume of sound are the same as those of the $12.00 Concert Roller Organ, of which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already sold nearly 5,000 to its subscribers, invariably giving entire satisfaction. The difference between the Gem Roller Organ and the $12.00 Concert Organ is in the outside case. When the Gem Roller Organ is operated, the music cannot be distinguished from that of its $12.00 companion, the Concert Roller Organ.

Bear in mind, please, that neither paper nor tape is used for the tunes, and consequently there is no winding or unwinding to be done.

Here is Our Marvelous Offer

GOOD UNTIL EASTER

To introduce THE CHRISTIAN HERALD into tens of thousands of homes where it is not now taken, we will from date to and including Easter Monday, supply the Gem Roller Organ, with three tunes of your own selection, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to a NEW Subscriber for one year, for only three dollars.

Our aim is to get our present subscribers to work for new subscriptions, and they may work out this proposition as follows:

A LECTURE IN A PUBLIC SCHOOL

THE WORKINGMAN'S FREE COLLEGE

Over 1,000,000 Adults Yearly Attending the Free Lecture Courses in New York—A Remarkable Experiment

By LAWRENCE H. TASKER

(Assistant Supervisor of Lectures)

THAT education should not cease when school age is past, is the belief of the New York Board of Education, and to give instruction to those who have come to perceive the value of lost opportunities, or who have the desire for further enlightenment, a unique system of adult education is now in operation. This is commonly called "Free Lectures for the People."

On any evening in the week, in many school halls throughout the city, crowds of men and women may be seen listening to lectures on science, literature, history, art, music, or travel. In one place, a course of lectures on "First Aid to the Injured," will be given by a prominent physician. At the conclusion of the course, an examination is held, and diplomas awarded. In another, an audience of mechanics will be listening to lectures on metallurgy, illustrated by experiments and demonstrations; in another, the wonders of the heavens will be revealed by a competent astronomer; in another, the people will hear discussed problems of municipal government; in still another, they will be told of life under strange conditions in the far-off countries of the world, while stereopticon pictures thrown on immense screens aid, by visual impression, the effect of the spoken word. All lectures on travel, and many on history and sociology, are illustrated by stereopticon views, lectures on science by experiments, and lectures on music by vocal or instrumental selections.

OLD AND YOUNG AS AUDITORS AT THE MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY

The classes of people who gather nightly in these halls are many and various. Originally established in 1889 for "the workingmen and workingwomen," they were extended by the revised charter of 1901 to be for "all the people," and the character of the audience varies according to the section of the city. At some centres, the auditors are noticeably hard-working, manual laborers; at others, those engaged in electrical and mechanical employments; at others, the more educated and professional classes. In some sections, those who attend are almost altogether of foreign birth—German, Russian, Italian or Hungarian. For these, the free lectures on American History, Institutions, and Government, do a great deal in preparing them for the intelligent exercise of the duties and privileges of citizenship in the land of their adoption. In certain places men attend almost exclusively; in many other places women form the majority of the regular attendants.

Of the 131 lecture centres of the Board of Education, about seventy per cent. are in the assembly halls of school buildings. But for this work there are also many churches and philanthropic societies which give the use of their auditoriums for one or two evenings a week. Until six years ago, there were scarcely any school buildings in New York that had proper auditoriums, with seats for adults. Yet, night after night, the people would climb seventy or eighty steps, up long flights of stairs, to the topmost story of a school building, and there sit on seats made for children, for the privilege of learning about Lincoln or Grant, or having the plays of Shakespeare expounded, or listening to the wonders of Science. Many of the school basements, though cold and draughty, were also turned into lecture halls. Now, all the large new million-dollar schoolhouses are being built with beautiful auditoriums, having in many cases upwards of 1,500 comfortable seats for adults. These new assembly halls have commodious stages, handsomely decorated walls and ceilings, and provision is made in some cases for pipe organs. In the Morris High School, where the auditorium is on the street level, the attendance at evening lectures has ave aged over 1,400. In one lecture centre last winter, where a course of eighteen lectures on "Heat as a Mode of Motion" was given, the average attendance was 1,050. In a course of "The Social Significance of European Capitals," recently given in two centres, the attendance averaged 1,075 in one centre and 1,800 in the other.

In the auditorium of the High School of Commerce, at the present time a course of lectures on "English Literature in the Nineteenth Century" is being given by one of the professors of Columbia University, and in another centre a course on "The Principles and Practice of Electrical Engineering." In Cooper Institute, a course of lectures on "Educational Topics of Present Interest," by College Presidents, has just closed. A series of lectures on "Cooking" is now going on in one school building, and is heartily endorsed by the women of that vicinity. Lectures are given on almost every subject, and are for the most part arranged in courses, leading from one series to another. For many halls the course is so planned that continuous instruction for a number of years is given in a practical branch of scientific study.

In 1890, Dr. Henry M. Leipziger, a practical educator of wide experience, was appointed supervisor of lectures, and it is owing to his wise management that the steady growth of the free lectures is due. During

SERMON BY

Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT: PROVERBS 10: 1

"A foolish son is the heaviness of his mother"

DEATH is an enemy. The Bible distinctly declares it. I remember some years ago, when visiting one of the New Zealand cities, this thought was impressed upon me as never before. A young man, a musical genius, had lately come from London and captured that whole city by his organ playing. He was to play that Sunday in the church where we were worshiping. The night before, coming home from practicing upon the keys, he sat down to eat dinner with his wife and two little children. Suddenly, he began to gasp. A fish-bone had caught in his throat. In a few minutes he was dead. The whole city was shocked at the awful tragedy The church was draped in black. The organ was covered with crape. Among the sobs of the dead man's friends, his pastor preached a eulogy upon this young man's life from I Cor. 15: 26, "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death." As the preacher uttered those solemn words, they sank into his hearers' consciences, an axiomatic truth.

Oh, yes, death is an enemy. Death at times seems to be a cruel and a merciless enemy. It breaks asunder the marital bands. It lifts the little baby out of the crib, and shuts her forever from our eyes by the closing of the coffin-lid. It strikes down the strong man who is proclaiming God's Word in the pulpit. It empties the office of the physician, who is bending over the patient. It sometimes sends the pleading lawyer to the grave even before the murderer whom he has defended expiates his crime upon the gallows. Oh, yes, death is an enemy. It snatches the mother away from the child, just at the critical period when her presence seems to be essential for its moral life. It strikes down General Lawton in a miserable little skirmish in the Philippines, when a soldier's fame and a soldier's reward for great service were laying honors and wealth at his very door.

Worse than Death

But when listening to that sermon in the far-off country of New Zealand, I soliloquized thus: "That widow is to-day having her heart crushed by the hearse's wheels even as the Indian juggernaut used to mangle the bodies of the Hindu devotees. But a living sorrow can be more formidable and a more awful enemy than a sorrow of the grave. The fiendish acts of a dissolute, a debauched, a drunken, a cruel, or an unfaithful husband can weigh more heavily upon the wife's heart than the corpse of a dead husband. And by the same reasoning the evil deeds of an undutiful or unfaithful son, fall upon the parental heart with a more crushing weight than the sod that falls upon the coffin-lid of a dead child. Thus to-day, from a parental standpoint, I would preach upon the agonizing sufferings of a father and a mother, when their children go astray and do wrong. I include here the father's sufferings, as well as the mother's. The full wording of the verse of my text embraces both parents. "A wise son maketh a glad father." That sentence, interpreted from the negative standpoint, means, "A bad boy maketh a sad father, and a foolish son is the heaviness of his mother."

Why sad? Why heavy? First, because the true father and mother can never separate their joys and sorrows from the joys and the sorrows of their child. Though a man may live after his right arm has been amputated, the hand and the arm cease to live as soon as the surgeon's knife has cut the arteries and the bones which unite them to the shoulder. But here nature seems to reverse the conditions of life. Though a child may live independent of his parent, a true parent can never live independent of his children. From the parental standpoint, the parental life and the child life are not only bone of one bone, and flesh of one flesh, but their existences are truly grafted upon each other. They derive their joys from the same source. Their sorrows make both hearts beat as one. They are interdependent. Like the Siamese twins, they have the same flow of blood through their arterial systems.

From the standpoint of a child you may not believe this. You ask, is not the love between parent and child a mutual love? Why then should not its separation affect the one equally with the other? Oh, no! The law of love is unequal. The one who makes sacrifices has a stronger affection, than the one for whom the sacrifices are made. I go into the sculptor's studio and I say, "Thorwaldsen, why art thou bending so lovingly over yonder piece of cold marble? Has the stone a heart?" "Oh, no," answers the Danish sculptor. "I do not love this stone because it has a heart. I love it because I have put my heart into it, in my effort to bring out the beautiful figures which there I see slumbering or beckoning to me from the cold stone." Why does the artist love his canvas and the composer his oratorio? Because their life's work has gone into the creations of those masterpieces of art, or of music. Why did Christopher Wren's life seem to be anchored to St. Paul's Cathedral, and Isaac Newton's life to his scientific laboratory? Because, in these places those men spent most of their earthly existence, in order to work out the problems of their lives.

Born of Self-sacrifice

Love inspired by sacrifice. That is true. Then how can a true father and mother help loving their children? How can they ever separate their existence from the joys and sorrows the successes and failures of their children? Oh, how many sacrifices they have made. Was it ten years of sacrifice? More than that. Twenty years, thirty years, forty years. For years and years, the burden of raising their families never left their minds and hearts. If I could take you back to your old homestead, thirty years ago, I would find all your children sound asleep. The mother and father, what are they talking so earnestly about? "Father," says the mother, "cannot you meet the mortgage on the farm, unless we cut down our expenses? Then I will have to let the hired girl go, and I will do my own cooking and washing." "Well," said your father, "we must not economize at the children's expense. We must raise the children right. They must be educated."

Why did your mother's hair grow white at thirty-five years of age, and your father's face begin to be "crow-marked?" Neither in the morning, noon, or night, could they be found shrinking from their unceasing labors for feeding, clothing, and educating their children. Now, man, do you think it is possible, after a quarter of a century of the hardest kind of work has gone for the support and development of the children, that the parents could ever be independent of them? Oh, no. Your father practically said: "If my children turn against me; then will my life be a failure indeed. If my boys turn out badly and my girls do not do what they ought to do, then will earthly life hold but little joy, either for me or their mother." My friends, your fathers and mothers worked too hard for their children for you to disappoint them in the results of their life's work. No matter what you do or say, you cannot make them forget you, or cease to live for you. Even the sinful plot of a Hebrew Prince to steal from a father his throne, could not make David do aught but cling to Absalom while he was alive, and sorrow for the wayward boy after he was dead.

Duties Neglected

But another reason why the burden of a sinful child is hard for the parent to bear: No sooner does a boy or a girl begin to go astray, than a true father and mother agonize on account of the stingings of a bitter self-reproach. Mark you this, wayward children; your parents do not blame you entirely for your sins. They are blaming themselves. They are looking away back over the scenes of the past. They are saying to their own hearts: "Did I do right when I let my boy do this, or that, or the other thing? Did I set my daughter the wrong example? Did I pray earnestly enough for my children when they were in my own nursery?" Oh the sadness! Oh the sorrow! Oh the bitter, bitter pangs of a merciless self denunciation, which comes to the parents when their boys and girls turn out badly. "A foolish son is the heaviness of his mother." Ay, heavy indeed is he, not only on account of the boy's sins, but also on account of those of his parents.

Let me illustrate my thought by a very common incident in life. There comes a quick ring at the bell. The summons calls me to go to your home. There I find your wife dying. I bring to you all the Gospel comfort I can. I say, "Mr. So and So, God's will be done. The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away, blessed be the name of the Lord." You say nothing. You keep your lips closely sealed. The more I call the less I find that you are comforted. At last, some day when we are alone, I say, "Mr. So and So, what is the matter?" "Well," you answer, "I do not know what to think. You say it is God's will that my wife died. I know it is not God's will. I know my negligence killed her. For months and months, my wife coughed badly. She had two or three hard spells of sickness. The doctors told me she ought to go South, but somehow I could not bring myself up to the resolve to let her go. The journey would cost a lot of money. Besides that, I needed her by my side. I could have saved her if I had sent her South in time. Oh, why did I not let her go? Why did I not let her go?" That is the remorse the true mother and the father have when their boys and girls go astray. "Oh, why did I not do differently when my children were by my side? Why did I not pray more, and live better than I did?"

But, my friends, though your parents made many mistakes in your bringing up, tell me, were not most of their errors made on account of the gentleness, rather than the meanness of their hearts? Even in their weaknesses, would you not have had them just as they were? Let me see; you started to go astray first, because they trusted you too much. They never thought that you would, or could do wrong. When you came home from college they were so proud to see you. They had kept sending check after check. My, how hard it was to get that money, but it was for their boy. And oh, the awful awakening they had when they found the money they sent, that hard earned money, was being spent for sin. Don't you remember how their hands trembled when they were placed upon your shoulder, and their lips quivered when they kissed you for the first time after that shock? Don't you remember how their tears—not your tears, but theirs—were left upon your cheek when they kissed you, a prodigal, returning home?

Sorrow in Old Age

Don't you remember how angry your father became, when your employer first insinuated that you had embezzled some of his money? Old as he was, his clenched fist was ready to knock that employer down. But after the undeniable proofs were presented, what did he do? Did he allow you to be sent to jail, as you ought to have been? It did no good to pay up that deficit or embezzlement. No, he did not let you go to jail. He took every dollar that he had saved up, to care for your mother and himself in their old age. He turned it all in, and signed notes for a thousand dollars more, to save you from your just punishment. He ought not to have done it. But now, in his old age, are you still going to sin, and have him lacerated by remorse, because he has been too kind to you?

But there is another reason why we sympathize with broken-hearted parents, who are bearing the heavy burdens of wayward and sinful children. Those burdens are placed upon backs too weak to carry them and upon hearts when they are too tender to suffer. It makes a great deal of difference how a man can bear a burden, whether he is old or young, sick or well, tottering or straight-limbed. You would not hitch an old horse up to a load he could easily have drawn in his prime. Neither, foolish son, should you make your parents in their old age bear the burdens of your sins.

How old are your parents? "Oh," you say, "father is about sixty years of age and mother is about the same. You know when our parents married, they did not do as do many people of the present day. They did not wait until they had amassed a fortune. Then the daughters were ready to start with the sons at the bottom of the ladder, to climb up. Therefore they married when they were young. Once young together, now they have grown old together." And then your lip quivers as you say: "But mother is not as strong as she used to be. And that old pain has come back in father's heart. He had a fainting spell last week." Ah, yes, they are growing old together! Perhaps, one of them is already gone. Is it not a mean act, an awfully mean act on your part, to take a broken-down woman or an old broken-down man, and place upon them the burden of your unpardoned sins? They once carried you in their arms, now you ought to be willing to let them lean upon your arm. They once wiped away your tears, now you should be willing to wipe away theirs. They once lived and are still living to ake you happy, now you ought to strive to make eir last days happy. Do not put that heavy burden your wickedness upon their hearts.

"But," some one says, "my old father and mother are t entirely dependent upon me for their happiness. I not the only child. As my parents are old-fashioned lks, so they had an old-fashioned family. Their mily was a big one. I have four brothers and three sters, and with the exception of one brother, we are alive to-day and have families of our own. Two of y brothers are Gospel ministers. I am the only black eep in the family. Thus you need not worry about e old folks. Five children out of six who are Chrisns, is not such a bad record." Ah, my brother, when u speak like that, even though you are married, I know u have not yet fathomed the depth of your mother's d father's love. The true Christian parents' happiss is dependent not upon the Christian lives of a few, t of all their children. No matter how many children Christian mother has, she is never happy unless all are the Gospel fold. She will never be happy if one gers outside.

Too Late for Pardon

"Oh," says some one, "would that I could do as you k. I would do anything on earth if I could only lift the rden of my sins, which I compelled my dear old ther and mother to carry; but it is too late. It is, s, too late. They are now forever past carrying the rden of my sins. My father died as did the father the Scotch poet. On his sick-bed he was asked by minister if he was worried about anything. Then father looked at me, as the father of Robert Burns oked at his son on a similar occasion, and he answered: am worrying about nothing, except my boy Robert.' t father is dead now. I can never bring him back tell him how I have repented of my past sins."

Your father and mother beyond the burden of your s? Friend, I do not know about that. Even in aven I think they are still longing and hoping for our lvation. I, for one, cannot understand how there can joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, and t any thoughts about us who are still unrepentant. ne of the greatest of New York pastors once told me, at when anything went wrong in his life, he used to el the warm, loving arms of his redeemed daughter out his neck, and he could hear her dear lips speak him words of counsel which would bring him to his better self. I do not believe it beyond the range of possibilities for our dear ones to be anxious about our unrepentant souls. Even now I would not be surprised if they were sending forth an angelic messenger to find out what our decision is to be. Heaven, beautiful heaven! Have our redeemed parents any burdens about our unpardoned sins in heaven?

At the Old Home

Perhaps, by taking you on a past journey to the place where I spent most of my boyhood days, I might help you to come to decision to give your hearts to Jesus Christ. The journey which you are to take occurred a short time after my father's burial. After his body had been laid away to sleep by the side of my mother, I said to my sister: "Come, let us go and look at the old house." We walked down the street where we both had played many many years before. As I went along, I began to call up the names of the different neighbors. But the houses now had strange faces looking out of the windows. The little children who were playing in the street, looked much like my old playmates. They laughed, and shouted, and jumped just as we used to jump, but their eyes were different. They edged off from the sidewalk as we came along. We were strangers to them. They were strangers to us.

Ah, yes, here is the old house. It stands as a sentinel overlooking Fort Green Park, where one of the old Revolutionary battles was fought and where some of the old Revolutionary veterans lie buried. From the outside, the old house looked about the same. There was the vine mother planted, still crawling over the side and clinging to the roof and trying to cover up the windows. Indeed, the house looked so much like the past, that I thought for an instant mother would be waiting for me in the front room, to welcome me home from college. Just to the rear of the house was the old grape-vine arbor built by Captain Spicer before he lost his wife and manly son when I can just remember. I had often taken my dessert of fruit there, before I answered the dinner-bell. But, come, I must not linger outside. Here, let me take a peek in at the window. I wonder if yonder policeman will think I am a thief. He wears just the same kind of brass buttons as did the officer who used to chase me off the park grass, when I was playing "hare and hounds" and climbing up yonder walls more like a trapeze performer than a hare scurrying for her burrow.

Yes, here is the parlor. There I saw my first Christmas tree. There they laid me as a little baby in a basket, as a Christmas present for my father. There, in that same room, I first saw the dead face of a relative. My brother's casket lay there. Mother's bier was covered with flowers there. And there we met to laugh as well as to weep.

Up and through the house we went. Each room had for us a history. In each place we could see the living and the dead side by side. Now it was a sister in her bridal robes; now a death-bed scene; now—but stop, I cannot go further. You would not have me if you could. The history of my old home was merely the history of yours, only under other names.

Waiting for Reunion

That afternoon I went away from the old homestead with a sad heart. "All that scene of love gone forever!" I kept saying: "All gone, all gone." Is it all gone forever? But that night, as I sped on West toward my own home, where my wife and children were waiting to greet me, I was looking out of the train window. I had my cheek resting upon my hand. I know not whether I was asleep or awake. But whether asleep or awake, suddenly a strange vision came to me. I seemed to see the dear faces of my loved ones who are gone. Among the twinkling stars of the night, I saw their bright eyes, and heard them speaking to me. They seemed to say: "The past is not dead. We are going to have our reunions again. We are here waiting. We are waiting for you. Will you live for Christ as we lived, that we may have these reunions?"

Are our parents in heaven concerned about us? They so loved us here, they were so anxious about our best interests, that I cannot believe they have forgotten us now. What news could so gladden their hearts, could the angelic messengers that pass from earth to heaven bring to them, than the news of your repentance? Shall we let them wait and keep waiting for our answer? Father, mother, we are coming! Yes, in a little while, after we have done our work for Christ, we shall come. Oh, sinful child, thou art not an orphan. You have a heavenly Father waiting. You have a redeemed earthly father and mother waiting. Wilt thou not lift from them the burden of their anxiety? Wilt thou not enhance their heavenly joys, by the assurance that thou art coming to complete the family circle around the throne?

A JEWISH AUDIENCE LISTENING TO A LECTURE IN "YIDDISH"

e last season, 4,665 lectures ere given throughout New ork City, and the attendance eached the astonishing total f 1,134,005. For the benefit f foreigners, instructive lecures are given in Italian and iddish. The subjects of these ectures relate chiefly to American history and biography, merican institutions, the ghts and duties of American itizenship, and also the principles of sanitation and hygiene. t is rather a pathetic sight to ee several hundred of these nmigrants, many of whom are bliged to live, eat, work, and leep in a single room, patiently waiting for the lecturer to egin to tell them how to preent and cure consumption, or ow to take a reasonable care f their bodies, when they are bliged to work in stuffy workhops for a mere pittance. In he colonies of Italians in Mulberry street, and in "Little taly" up in Harlem, the free lectures seem to be very opular.

Lecturers are drawn from two sources: first, from the taffs of the colleges and universities, and secondly, from he writers, artists, scientists and travelers who, while not engaged in any especial institution of learning, have yet become specialists from their careful and profound study of a limited range of topics. As the aim of the lecture course is instruction, not entertainment, the best teacher naturally makes the best lecturer.

One of the aims of the lecture course is the increase of serious reading and study. To bring this about, not only is there the most cordial co-operation with the various public libraries, but books are loaned directly to the people interested, by means of what is known as the "Platform Library." In connection with the courses of lectures a syllabus is prepared, giving outlines of the lectures, and citing a selected list of books for wider reading. At the close of each lecture a "quiz" class, lasting from half an hour to three-quarters is held, at which points may be explained.

With the growth of the lecture system, a spirit of hearty co-operation on the part of Churches, Settlements, Neighborhood Houses, and other philanthropic bodies, has been developed. Many of the splendid halls of these institutions are given free of charge to the city for lecture purposes. That the Churches recognize the fact that a lecture centre is one of the best means for social upbuilding of the people of the community, is a progressive sign of the times.

The free evening lectures, giving as they do, an opportunity to the toiler and wage-earner to obtain a broader outlook, a wider horizon, greater knowledge, and with it greater power, are doing an inestimable good in the general uplifting of the cosmopolitan population. One auditor writes: "To work all day, and at night, when tired out, to sit down and attempt to study, is no easy thing; but to hear an illustrated lecture, from which you gain twice as much as from a book, to say nothing of its interest, is an opportunity for which we should be exceedingly grateful."

Another, speaking of the musical lectures, writes: "How we enjoy the singing! I know you would be glad to see those happy faces. We sing at our work and are glad when Thursday comes." Still another writes: "In the evening, one does not care to stand on the street corners, and moreover, one cannot improve the mind by standing there. I have come out of the lectures many a night with but one regret, and that was, that the lecture had not lasted longer."

When the need for the instruction of the masses of the population of the second largest city of the world, along the lines of physiology, hygiene, sanitation, and the civic and economic problems, is so apparent, no one will deny the value of the system of giving this learning freely to the people, nor of adding to it the opportunity to become acquainted more and more with the literatures of ancient and modern peoples, the latest investigations in science, and the wonders and beauty revealed by the true teacher in every matter of research.

THE RUSSIAN WORKMAN AT HOME

WHOSE EFFORTS TO SECURE POLITICAL FREEDOM HAVE CAUSED THE UPHEAVAL IN THE EMPIRE

RUSSIAN WORK PEOPLE OUT ON STRIKE

A RUSSIAN MUJIK

A GROUP OF RUSSIAN PEASANTS ON A JOURNEY

AT the present moment, the civilized world has its attention fixed upon the events occurring in St. Petersburg and other large cities of Russia, and it awaits with intense interest the results that apparently must follow this uprising of the Russian peasantry.

The Russian laborer in large cities is only the peasant in new quarters. During the long winter days, when no work can be done outdoors, the mujik passes his time asleep on the stove, or if, as it sometimes happens, he is of an industrious turn, he spends his time carving with a common knife the wooden spoons, bowls, and a thousand other home-made articles of commerce that are sold throughout Russia at the fairs. These koustari, as they are called, graduate into rough mechanics, and are draughted into the great cities, where, in late years, foreign capital has erected countless factories and machine shops.

The mujik must first get the consent of the village mir (council), to become a city workman, before he can leave his comrades even, and must always retain his share in the communal lands, and pay the tax thereon. Should he fail to do so, the starosta, or head-man of the village, will notify the Zemstov, and the mujik will be sent back home, and his passport taken from him. But it is seldom that the mujik ever returns to the commune; he will slave and starve to pay his tax; that is why, in the larger cities of Russia, the svoschiks, or cab-drivers, compete with the tram-cars for fares. Accustomed to a diet of black bread and kvas a drink made from fermented cabbage leaves—the mujik in town can live richly on scraps, and as for a sleeping-place when work is scarce, the palace cellars supply that. In the northern capital, whole families are reared in these noisome places, under the very eyes of the good-natured police.

My first intimate acquaintance with the Russian workman was at Sormovar, near Nijni-Novgorod, where the American-equipped locomotive works employ 15,000 workmen, all peasants, who have learned to use our modern labor-saving machinery. These men, who are paid from a few cents to half a-dollar a day for skilled mechanics, are typical of the Russian laborer the Empire over. Illiterate, they obey instructions blindly, and learn to do their appointed tasks with satisfactory precision. A high stockade surrounds the works at Sormovar, and beyond this the company has built a city of wooden houses for its workmen. The streets, as is usual in all Russian towns, are unpaved, and used as drains. In compliance with the new laws, a hospital is maintained by the company, and a schoolhouse. This school is chiefly for technical training, for in Russia the son is expected to follow the trade of the father, and it is only recently that Russia has began to build up a class of hereditary factory hands and mechanics.

There had been a strike at the Sormovar works, just previous to my arrival, fomented by visiting Socialists, for the Russian workman is simple and easily led. Soldiers were sent up from Nijni-Novgorod, but refused to fire on the strikers, so they were marched back home, and an officer of the company, addressing the strikers, asked them as brothers to name their demands. Then began a babel of voices; no one seemed to know just what the strike was about, for the Socialist visitors had deserted them, and they lacked a leader. At last, one lusty, red-headed mujik bellowed: "We want more holidays." This, too, in a land where there are 153 legal holidays, when no work may be done. The director now addressed the workmen as his children, and they all filed laughing into the yards to resume work. Had their brothers in uniform obeyed the order to fire, what a different story there would be to tell!

The Russian workman is not a saint, nor is he a demon, unless drunk on vodka or incendiary speeches, both of which easily affect his simple brain. That he is capable of absolute fidelity to his employers, and has the making of a good workman in him, if given the proper chance, is shown by the experience of American contractors in Russia. At the St. Petersburg Westinghouse air-brake works, the foreman is an ex-peasant, who began to learn his present trade with the company when it first started business in St. Petersburg. Brushing against a higher grade of men than he had formerly known, the young peasant learned to read and write, and then began to study mechanics at night. Shrewd and faithful, he was advanced to his present position, even over the heads of American workmen. During the recent troubles the company closed its works only because requested to do so by the police.

That the strike in St. Petersburg was unanimous, need surprise no one familiar with the Russian workman. Accustomed always to membership in an artel, or body of workers, paid by the job, there is never a dissenting voice from the decision of the majority, or a command of the starosta (the elected chief who receives and distributes the pay among his comrades). Individuality scarcely exists in Russia; the workmen go either one way or the other as a whole. If there is a brain above the dead level of mediocrity, it does the thinking, and the thousands are eager and willing to be led; they ask not where if only they have confidence in the leader. This is why foreigners have governed Russia ever since the Mucovites called the Swedish Rurik to be their Czar, and to this day, few among the Emperor's advisers are full-blooded Slavs.

At the Putiloff works, where the government is the direct employer, American machinery, the most massive and complete in the world, is used, and wages run from twelve to sixty cents a day. The peasant, idle all winter long, who could live on a scrap of black bread, finds that hard work and long hours twelve months in the year, breed a voracious appetite, and moreover, truth to tell, the city mujik has learned to consider as necessities what were originally luxuries not to be even dreamed of in the village commune.

The Russian workman of to-day wants his children to go to school. He himself attends the secular Sunday School frowned upon by the Government, where he learns from charitably-disposed persons, in their private residences, how to read and write. He wants higher wages, and, in many cases, it is true, more vodka and more holidays; for it is a sad fact, that in Russia, Monday is usually spent by Ivan sobering up, so that many factories do not even open their doors until Tuesday. It is but fair to state, that wherever education has made way among the workmen, drunkenness has decreased.

The Russian workman wants better times, but that he has any specific idea of how this is to be brought about is not credible; he looks to his leaders to solve the problem, and, if they cannot, he is ready to follow any plausible talker into pastures new. The peasants have a belief that only in their slumber do they really live, while their waking hours of agonizing toil are but nightmares, from which they escape to the real, happy life, when they fall asleep. The workmen of Russia to-day, fatalists by teaching and inclination, have not forgotten this fable of their childhood, and are willing to seek the sleep of death, rather than bear the ills loaded upon them.

The government holds in suspense a greater punishment over the city laborer than death itself—the threat to send him back to his native village. Semi-starvation in the great capitals, where all Russians share with one another, is better than the stagnation of peasant life. The three million workmen of Russia may well be lost among the ninety million peasants throughout the Czar's realm; but once the peasants and the workmen of the cities rise as a unit, government of any sort must fall. The autocracy realizes this, and with the mercantile business of the empire practically in the hands of the despised Jew and hated foreigner, even the most bitter among them, fear that the further superseding of the Russian workmen may raise the cry from one end of the empire to the other: "Russia for the Russians!" A really nationalistic movement of the people would leave the autocrats without the fold, for to-day practically the only pure Russians are the tillers of the soil and the humble laborers of the cities.

A. H. FORD.

IN HONOR OF PASTOR SHELDON

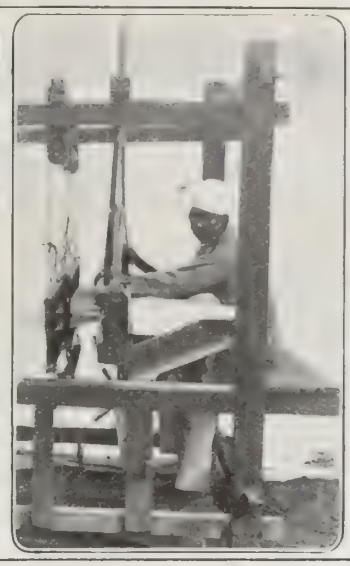
FOR a number of years, the faculty and students of Washburn College, Topeka, Kan., have desired to put in permanent form their appreciation of the work done for them by Rev. Charles M. Sheldon. It is now planned to construct a building to be called Sheldon Hall, which will be the centre of the active religious and social life of this growing Christian school. Ever since Dr. Sheldon came to Topeka, he has taken a deep interest in the students. The greater portion of them attend his church, and he is popularly known as the "College Pastor." He is an almost daily visitor at the college, and many of his stories were first written for their edification. He is known to the whole Christian world as the author of In His Steps and other works. His experiment of publishing a newspaper, to illustrate his theory that journalism should not exploit vice and crime, is vividly remembered. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now publishing his latest and most important story, The Heart of the World.

Washburn College is the leading college of Kansas, and has over seven hundred students, and its influence is rapidly widening. Rev. Norman Plass, D.D., is its president. Although founded by the Congregationalists, it is undenominational, and works on broad Christian lines. It has long felt the need of such a building as the proposed Sheldon Hall, to accommodate the college Y.M.C.A. and the Y.W.C.A., the college paper, athletic board, literary societies and furnish parlors for college social gatherings. It is desired to start an interdenominational subscription, to erect and equip this building, which will cost about $25,000. The faculty and students will head the list with the sum of $3,000, and Mr. Sheldon himself will make a liberal contribution.

Any readers of this paper, who may wish to join with these earnest students in honoring the author of In His Steps, can do so, with the feeling that they are assisting not only the college of to-day, but helping generations of young men and women to build that unseen, yet most important of all structures—character. Any communications regarding the work addressed to President Plass, Washburn College, Topeka, Kan., will receive prompt attention.

Industrial Training for the Orphans in India

A SEWING CLASS AT BAPATLA



A LESSON IN WEAVING

THE WHEELWRIGHT'S PUPILS

OUR readers who have nobly and generously sustained the relation of foster-parents to orphans in India, will be interested in an item of news hat is sent by Mrs. Aldrich, who, with her husband, he Rev. Floyd Aldrich, has charge of the Methodist Episcopal Mission, at Narsinghpur. It is the announcement of the marriage of seven young men who have een trained and educated at the Mission. Two of hem are expert shoemakers, one is a carpenter, another n overseer, another a teacher, and two are workers in he Evangelistic Department of the Mission. It is ratifying to learn that the young men did not seek rides with dowries, or non-Christian wives, but made heir choice of orphans like themselves, who had been rought up in the Girls' Orphanages at Khandwa and abbalpur. Their means are small, but they are able to arn their own living, and in India that fact is considered sufficient justification for marriage. The important act is that the homes they are establishing are Christian omes, and will serve as an example to the people around hem. When we consider that both brides and bridegrooms were, a few years ago, hopelessly destitute, rphaned by the famine, and would probably have erished like their parents, if generous Christian people n America had not pledged themselves for their support, e have reason to rejoice in the noble benefaction that as made these marriages possible.

The influence of these Christian families cannot fail o make itself felt throughout India. Mrs. Lee, of alcutta, describes in eloquent terms the consistency nd devotion of the orphans under her care, who have iven themselves to Christ. Mr. Brock, of the Baptist elugu Mission, reports the baptism of fifteen girls and x boys on profession of faith. Mr. I. W. Back, of holka, writes that forty-four of his boys have conssed the Lord in baptism, and some of them are prearing for evangelistic work. In one case—that of he Orphanage at Pasrur—every one of the famine hildren have been received into communion and they ive evidence, by the gentleness and sincerity of their lives, that the spirit of Christ is dwelling in their hearts. The hopefulness of this work passes description. These children, saved from starvation, are going forth in a proportion larger than could have been expected, to spread the knowledge of the Gospel through the villages and cities of India; some of them to preach it and the others to prove its power by their lives. In some instances, the money that has supported them during these five years has involved privation and self-denial on the part of the patrons in this country who have provided it; but what a reward it has brought! A soul saved! Who can estimate its value? Only He who gave his life to save souls. It will be as workers together with Him, that He will greet those who have denied themselves to support one of these little ones.

It is impossible to speak too highly of the industrial work which, also, is making excellent progress. Rev. H. Huizinga reports an earnest desire on the part of the boys to learn trades. There was a time when boys regarded mechanical work as degrading. Now, however, they are realizing that a boy who knows how to make something or do something is more independent than he who knows nothing but the tilling of the land, and has a better opportunity of self-support. When Mr. Huizinga announced that he could take a few more boys into the Industrial Department, nearly thirty offered themselves. He had already fifty-two at work, and is now treating that department as a reward for proficiency in school studies. The practical spirit of the boys is shown by the fact that the majority of them want to learn to be shoemakers.

Miss Greene, who is at Phalera, gives an equally encouraging report of the girls. They are turning out beautiful laces and embroidery,which command a ready sale, and others are weaving cloth and blankets. Some of the girls are showing a taste for gardening, and are improving in their household occupations. Miss Anderson, of Pasrur, gives similar testimony. She says that girls who were utterly ignorant of the commonest duties, can sew, spin, and do other kinds of work, besides keeping their houses orderly and neat. She adds, "I have engaged in the course of my life in many kinds of mission work, but I have never done anything for the Master that I have enjoyed so much, or anything that has been so fruitful of results, as this work among the famine children." This is also the testimony of other missionaries. They, on their side, have faithfully fulfilled their promises, and have patiently and tirelessly devoted themselves to the training and teaching of the poor famine waifs. It must be a great source of gratification to those whose gifts have enabled the missionaries to do such congenial work, to learn how blessed are results of their sacrifices.

Shall this grand work cease? That is the question the missionaries are asking. The period for which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was authorized to pledge the support of its readers expires in August next. During the past five years the pledge has been honorably fulfilled. Punctually to the day, a check for the amount required has been sent to India, and the missionaries have been enabled to feed, clothe, and educate the children. What shall the future be? Shall the good work go on? The industrial education especially deserves to continue. It is so valuable, so promising, its utility so clearly proved that it seems a pity to discontinue it. It is to a large extent the key to the missionary problem in India. The system is now thoroughly organized; the missionaries have the apparatus and the teachers; and children are accessible. The only need is the money to continue the work. The missionaries believe that the patrons who have supported the orphans during the past five years, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund, having seen the value of the work will not lose their interest in their protegees at this auspicious time. They appeal to all to continue their help, so that they as well as other children may be equipped for a life of Christian service. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sympathizes with their desire, and will, as heretofore, be glad to forward to India the contribution of any patron who is willing to aid in this Christlike work.

MANY HELPED TO BETTER LIVES

THE early morning breakfasts of the Bowery Mission, which were first begun January, 1904, and resumed last Thanksiving morning,have been the means under od of saving hundreds of lives. These reakfasts are intended only for those who re homeless and are compelled to tramp he streets through the long, dreary hours f the night, ill-clad, friendless, hungry and estitute, and having no roof to cover hem. The Mission doors are thrown open ach morning at 1 A.M., and hot coffee nd rolls served to one thousand of these oor fellows. It seems a little thing to do, et it shortens the dreary hours, and inuses cheerfulness and courage into many well-nigh hopeless man.

It is pitiable to see so many respectableooking men compelled to partake of this ospitality. They stand shivering in the Bread-line, night after night, waiting for he doors to open. The number of young en in that line is startling, and many a eart-rending story has been told of those oung men being attracted to the city from comfortable country homes, in the hope of getting employment. Becoming discouraged from repeated disappointments, they have drifted gradually down the social scale, and, at last, are found hopeless and friendless on the Bowery and standing in the Bread-line.

The Free Labor Bureau has been a blessing to hundreds of idle and unfortunate men. Although the bureau has been in operation only since the beginning of the year, already between three and four hundred men have been placed in good situations in the country, and, in almost every instance, they have given satisfaction. The management anticipate a very busy time within the next week or two, when the farming season opens up. Hundreds of these men are anxiously pleading that they may find employment in the country.

Very encouraging reports come from the employers. One of these relates to J. H. G., a man who was found in the Bread-line one bitterly cold night, shivering and almost famished with hunger. He was spoken to kindly and invited to attend the Mission meetings. He did so, and fresh hope and ambition took hold of him. His story was a sad one. Having left a comfortable home, he came to New York to "make his fortune." Like thousands of others he met nothing but disappointment, and at last, becoming utterly discouraged, he drifted to the cheap lodging-houses on the Bowery. His money soon ran out and he became a wanderer; having no means of returning home, and nothing wherewith to buy food. When found in the Breadline he was almost starved. The Labor Bureau found a situation for him. He has written, telling how happy and contented he is, and has given such satisfaction to his employer that the latter has come to the bureau for half a dozen more men, and will make J. H. G. his foreman.

Extracts are given below from a few out of many letters received:

Arthur S. (Lincoln, Va.): "I am many times thankful to you for the place you got me . . . . I shall never regret the first day I went to the Bowery Mission."

George G. (New Berlin, N. Y.): "The people here are so kind to me. You have put me on the road of turning to best good man."

Frank C. (Patersonville, N. Y.): "I feel like a new man. I am in a Christian family where they have family prayer."

W. C. (Silver Springs, N. Y.): "I am perfectly satisfied. Mr. and Mrs. —— are practical Christians. I appreciate their kindness greatly and will try to do my part like a man."

J. G. P. (Norvell, Mich., an employer), writes: "The boys arrived all right. Am well pleased with them."

W. C. G. (Newton, N. J., an employer), writes: "The man has been here a week. I seem to like his manner and kindness as well as his work."

Geo. D. S. (West Berne, N. Y., an employer), writes: "Thus far we are very much pleased with the efforts of Frank S. . . . Especially in caring for stock and the poultry . . . . I believe he is in dead earnest . . . . When a man is trying to be a man, I believe it is the duty of every Christian to do all in his power to encourage and help him."

Surely this work is worth continuing. The cost of maintenance is considerable, as many of the men have to be taken care of as well as properly clothed, until situations are found for them. Those wishing to help in this work, may send their contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

A Philanthropist's Will

IN a will recently offered for probate in a Pittsburg, Pa., court, there is evidence of a conception of philanthropy on the part of the testator, which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are specially fitted to appreciate. The will, which is that of a wealthy Scotchman named Robert MacFerron, provides that in the probable event of three of his relatives dying without issue, his estate shall be realized and vested in the hands of trustees. The whole amount is to be invested in safe securities, and every year one-half of the proceeds shall be added to the principal. The other half is to be available, at the discretion of the trustees, for giving prompt relief to the sufferers from any calamity, such as fire, flood, tempest, explosions or epidemic diseases, in which speedy help may be needed.

The advantages of such a fund are obvious. So suddenly do calamities sometimes come, that the sufferers might perish of starvation or exposure, if they were not immediately relieved. Our people are never deaf to appeals for help, but delay, which might be fatal, must necessarily ensue before the machinery of relief could be organized. A fund always available for an emergency would obviate such a possibility, and would ensure the blessing that doubles its value by its promptitude.

The bequest is singularly beautiful and Christian. It is a provision for strangers, whose identity is utterly unknown to the testator. Like the Good Samaritan, he does not stay to inquire whether the beneficiaries have any claim upon him. The mere fact that they are in need of succor, establishes their claim, and he makes provision for satisfying it. It is the claim of common humanity, but it was not until Christ proclaimed the Gospel of humanity that the duty of meeting it was recognized. Again and again have appeals appeared in these columns for the relief of people suddenly afflicted, and the response to them has been generous in the extreme. In the name of Christ, and for his sake, the money needed has been given. Foreigners, as well as our own people, have benefited by the liberality, for difference of race is no barrier to the Christ spirit. Our readers, who have been so long prominent in the work of relieving the afflicted will hail the bequest of this Pittsburg testator as a further development of this Christian spirit.

The Age of Achievement

DR. WILLIAM OSLER, a professor with some claims to distinction for original utterance, delivered an address recently at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, which has excited considerable comment on two continents. He is reported to have said, in substance, that men over forty are comparatively useless, and those over sixty absolutely so; that all the "telling work" of the world, with rare exceptions, has been accomplished by men under forty; and that it would be for the general good of the race, if all men over sixty were retired from active work.

Professor Osler's sweeping characterization, like many similar sensational statements, combines a grain of truth with a vast deal that is unprovable. "Young men for action; old men for counsel," runs the proverb, and if the Professor meant that the bulk of the world's fighting, its adventures, explorations and exploits of hardihood and sheer daring have been and are still performed by young men, he was well within the truth. But there are other kinds of achievements which make a pretty substantial impression on the world's progress besides mere physical effort, high courage, strenuous enterprise and the immature sentimentalism of hot, young blood. Youth is "the most beautiful thing in the world;" but in his indulgent effort to adorn it with all the virtues, Dr. Osler has wholly overlooked the fact, that almost all the intellectual, scientific, philosophic and literary progress the world has ever known, has come from the brains of men of mature age and ripe wisdom and experience.

It has been so all through history. Moses was eighty when he led the Exodus; Cato was the same age when he began to study Greek; Sophocles, after four-score, wrote his grandest tragedy; Socrates at seventy conducted his own trial, and uttered the famous "Defence," which has been preserved to us by Plato; Galileo at seventy was fighting the great battle of his life against Pope Urban and the Inquisition. In a later age, we find Chaucer at sixty writing his famous Canterbury Tales; Goethe writing his immortal Faust at eighty; Kepler making his great scientific discovery at sixty-nine; Bacon, at the same age, writing his Novum Organum; Gutenberg, after fifty, setting up the world's first printing-press; Humboldt writing his Cosmos after seventy; Franklin conducting his wonderful electrical experiments when past mid-life; Washington winning battles after fifty, and in the prime of his intellectual and administrative activities after sixty; Jefferson, Hamilton, the Adamses and a host of other patriotic spirits giving their ablest services to the nation after middle age; Gladstone still studying his Greek at eighty; Disraeli premier of an empire in his old age; Palmerston active in the public arena at eighty-one. In spiritual work, we find Wesley at eighty-eight still preaching, and never so popular or effective as during those last years of his life; John Knox at sixty-seven in the thick of his fight against Queen Mary and the Catholics; Dr. Chalmers leading the "Disruption" after sixty; Beecher at seventy, as "the old man eloquent"; Gen. William Booth at seventy-five still conducting successful world-campaigns for souls. Dr. Talmage after seventy, was a far mightier influence in the pulpit or the press than in his earlier years. It is hardly necessary to extend the list, though we might speak of Tennyson, Whittier and Longfellow, all of whom did their finest work after the frost had begun to silver their hair; Swinburne, who still sings so grandly though past seventy, and the veterans, Ibsen and Tolstoi, who are in the van of literary leadership, as were those other veterans, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer and John Stuart Mill, in the field of science and speculative philosophy.

But the world, after all, has long recognized the truth that human achievement is confined to no particular age, but belongs to every stage of life. Youth and age each has its triumphs. The true standard by which a man's value to his day and generation must be judged is the measure by which he has added to the world's stock of wisdom, or comfort, or happiness. He who does this, does more for humanity than he who advances the boundaries of an Empire, at the cost of blood and treasure and infinite human sorrow.

IF YOU HAD ONLY A YEAR TO LIVE

How Would You Spend It?

This is the Startling Theme of the New Serial Story:

The Resurrection of Miss Cynthia

By FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

The first chapters of which will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in our April 5 issue. In this remarkable story, which is unquestionably the most absorbing ever written by the famous author of "Stephen," "Titus," "The Singular Miss Smith," and "The Needle's Eye," the heroine, Miss Cynthia, is doomed by the doctors, who startle her with the announcement that she has inherited an ailment that must terminate fatally within a twelvemonth.

What she does, and how this news transforms not only her own life but the lives of many others, is told in the story itself.

It is a strange, vivid, fascinating tale of human life in a New England village of to-day; splendidly written, and so full of interest that the attention of the reader is held fast from the first chapter to the close.

"Only a year to live!" What would you have done under similar conditions? Read and find out what she did, and how it all came about when the time fixed by the men of science arrived.

"The Resurrection of Miss Cynthia"

Friends Out of Sight

BEYOND our sight, but as truly alive as when they were with us here, are our dear ones whom God has taken. They do not sit at the table, nor walk with us on the street; they toil no longer; they are not racked with pain, nor tormented with fever, nor saddened by hope deferred. Their mistakes, their regrets, their ambitions, their disappointments, these accumulations are all of the past, so far as earth is concerned. They have gone on to where "beyond these voices there is peace."

But though out of sight they are not non-existent. They live and love as of old. It may be that often they glide across the threshold and hover over us as we sit beside the hearth. The mother, out of sight, may still bless and guard her child. The sister may be a ministering spirit to her brother beloved. We are not forbidden to fancy that our friends out of sight, so far as our purblind vision is concerned, may see and help us still.

Our friends in heaven are not more remote than our friends across the great ocean, our friends in India, Syria, China, Japan, or on some distant coast. We may even reach them sooner by way of the throne. In prayer, they and we may meet at Jesus' feet.

Dare not think, oh, sceptic soul, that our friends in heaven never pray. Is not the great Intercessor there and do they not, copying him, pray in God's presence for those they have left behind? Very busy they are in tasks that are blessed beyond words. Very happy too, where no flaw rifts the perfect jewel of immortal joy.

They are ours, and God's, our friends out of sight to whom we shall go, though they shall not return to us.

Is the "Simple Life" Practicable?

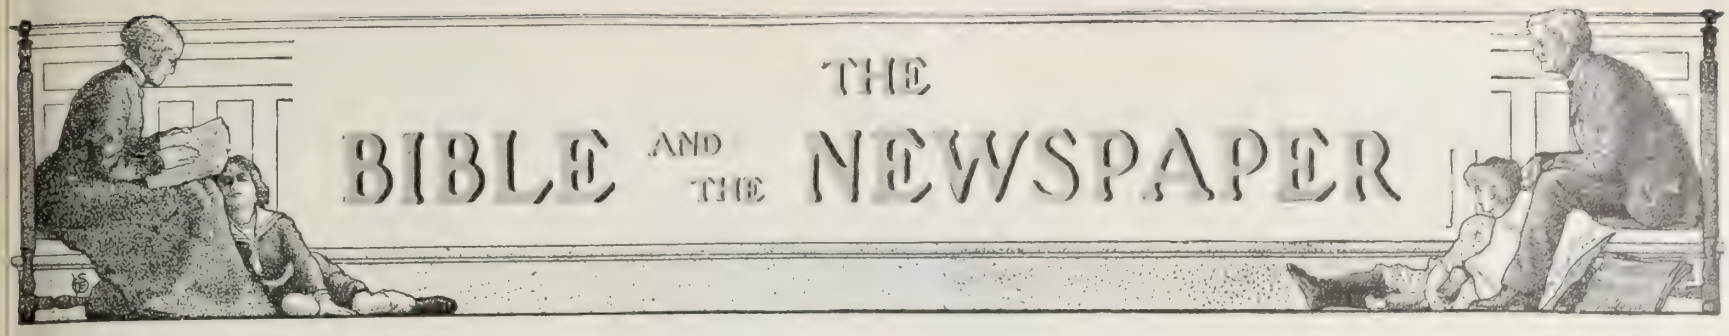
FROM many quarters the query comes to us, "Is the Simple Life Possible in America?" It comes from readers who are wishful to know whether, in our opinion, the serene existence, so attractively pictured by Pastor Wagner in his books and in his public addresses while visiting us recently, is of actual attainment in a country like ours, where ceaseless activity, universal competition and incessant struggle are the rule. It has been charged that we are a nation without leisure or sane recreations. Europeans say we take even our pleasures too seriously. Can we aspire to the "Simple Life," or is it a state utterly beyond our reach?

The March 29 issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will present the views of the leading men and women of the nation on this absorbing topic. Our friends, after reading this remarkable symposium, may be better able to answer the question. The perusal will be found helpful, uplifting and suggestive. We believe the Christ-like philosophy of the Paris Mission Pastor to be attainable but only through sacrifice. Are we capable of making this sacrifice, and of translating this ideal condition into a reality in our homes and our personal lives?

Among the Workers

—MR. AND MRS. J. M. MACKNIGHT, missionary workers on the Canary Islands, are leaving their station for a year's rest. They have been wonderfully successful in their spiritual work among the Spanish people of the islands.

—MRS. KATE H. YOUNG writes from Porte Alegre, Brazil, that her husband, Rev. R. Young, an American missionary there, is compelled to withdraw from the field temporarily, in consequence of fever and physical breakdown.



Mrs. Stanford Dead

THE sudden death, in Honolulu, on Feb. 28, of Mrs. Jane Lathrop tanford, widow of Senator Stanford of an Francisco, has caused a profound nsation among her many friends. She ad gone to Hawaii under a severe nervus strain. In January last, it was beeved that some one had attempted to oison her. She escaped death at that me, but feared a renewal of the atempt, and, it is believed, that she went on er journey to avoid any such plot. Durng her stay at Honolulu she was in her sual health, but shortly before midnight n Feb. 28 she drank a mixture of bicaronate of soda, which she had brought ith her from San Francisco. She cried ut at once that she was poisoned. Medal assistance was summoned, but no reef could be afforded, and in less than an our she was dead. The police of San 'rancisco were notified, and are conducting an investigation to discover the riminal.

Mrs. Stanford's life for many years had been one of intense devotion to the memory of her husband and son, and to the nterests of the University which was ounded as a memorial of the latter. She was eighty years of age, and was narried to Mr. Stanford in 1851, when he was comparatively a poor man. In 1867 heir only son was born. It was his death, at the age of seventeen, which changed the whole current of her life. From being a woman of society, she became a mourner and a devotee. She gave herself exclusively to charitable enterprises, and notably to Leland Stanford University at Palo Alto, Cal. The plan of this great, free University was made during Mr. Stanford's Senatorship. It was commenced in 1887, and was opened in 1891. Two years later Senator Stanford died, and there was much anxiety as to the course Mrs. Stanford would take in regard to it. It was soon set at rest.

Though a long period of litigation followed, Mrs. Stanford increased the endowment which her husband had made. The courts made her a liberal allowance, but she gave nearly the whole of it to the University, that the work of education might go on, and the salaries of the Professors be paid. The pressure increased while her case was going from court to court, and at last Mrs. Stanford determined to sell the jewels that she treasured as gifts from her dead husband, to meet the deficit. In 1896 the difficulty was overcome by the decision in her favor, handed down by the Supreme Court. Gradually Mrs. Stanford increased the endowment of the University, and in 1901 she gave it practically the remainder of her estate, amounting to twenty-eight million dollars. Dr. David S. Jordan, the President of Stanford University, says of her: "Hers was a life of most perfect devotion to her own and her husband's ideals. If in the years we knew her she ever had a selfish feeling, no one ever detected it. All her thoughts were of the University and of the way to make it effective for wisdom and righteousness." It is a noble record of devotion to a great cause. Her gifts, and the sacrifices that made them possible, will bear fruit to future generations who, through her beneficence, will prove the soundness of the wise king's words:

How much better is it to get wisdom than gold, and to get understanding than silver (Prov. 16: 16).

LELAND STANFORD UNIVERSITY AT PALO ALTO, CALIF., AND ITS LATE BENEFACTRESS

Forgot His Own Warning

A sad accident occurred on the subway in New York, a few days ago. As the motorman of a train going northward was approaching a station on Lenox Avenue, he saw, to his horror, a man climbing out of a manhole immediately in front of the car. It was impossible to shut off the power in time to save his life, for the train was close to the unfortunate man at the moment. It passed on, leaving him a mangled corpse. He proved to be a trackwalker who had occasion to inspect the lower levels, and having done his work, was emerging from the hole just as the train reached the place. A pathetic feature of the accident was the testimony of another employee, who said he had been saved only a few hours before, from being killed in just the same way, by the very man who had now lost his own life. It is strange that a man so well aware of the danger as to warn another, should have been so incautious as to himself. There are some engaged in Christian work of whom it is to be feared that the same thing may be said. There needs to be continued vigilance on the part of every man lest the fate spoken of by the Apostle befall him.

Lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway (I. Cor. 9: 27).

Change of Name

Attention is called by a Washington journal to the importance of a person who wishes to change his name, taking legal measures to protect himself from inconvenience and possible loss. There is no difficulty in obtaining the sanction of the courts to the change, when there is a valid reason for it. Sometimes a man wishes to drop his right name because it is of foreign origin and difficult for an American tongue to pronounce. Or his name may have in English an absurd or even vulgar meaning and subject him to unpleasant jokes, or it may associate him with some notorious criminal, or be the counterpart of some name which history made infamous. Reasons of this kind are recognized by the courts, and permission is given, as it is to children who have been adopted by persons who desire the child to bear their names. Under the court's order the change of name is registered and all rights accruing to the individual under his original name are protected. That is necessary, lest in the event of property being left to a man, his change of name might confuse his identity. All such considerations are of no concern to him who at the last receives his heavenly inheritance and with it his new name.

I will write upon him the name of my God and the name of the city of my God (Rev. 3: 12).

The Fight for Clean Money

A Committee of the House of Representatives is taking evidence on the report that legislation is needed to compel the issue of new currency in the place of that which has been in circulation. One of the witnesses last week was Dr. Thomas Darlington, Health Commissioner of New York. He testified that he had submitted a number of coins and bills to Dr. Park, the bacteriologist of a hospital in the city. The money had been obtained from a cheap jewelry store, where the customers were chiefly poor people. The result was that pennies were found to contain, on the average, 26 living bacteria; dimes, 40; moderately clean bills, 1,250; and dirty bills, 73,000. As to the duration of the contamination, the result of isolating bills, was that the bacteria of the clean bills were still alive at the end of twenty-one days, and those on the dirty bills survived to the end of a month. It may be hoped that Congress will insist on more care being taken, by the issue of new money in place of the old, to prevent infection. It is, however, unlikely that any one will refuse to accept bills, howsoever old they are, because of the risk of contracting disease. The majority of people are so eager to get money that they are not deterred even when it involves peril to the soul.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction (I Timothy 6: 9).

BRIEF NOTES

There are now upwards of 800 fully qualified medical missionaries in the Foreign Mission field.

A South African philanthropist has given 80,000 acres of land to the Salvation Army, on which they may settle destitute families.

It is reported that not less than six thousand persons made confession of faith during the revival at Louisville, Ky. Eighteen evangelists took part in the services.

The total issues of the American Bible Society for the past year, were 1,770,891 Bibles and portions. During its existence the Society has issued 74,441,674 volumes.

Preparations are being made in this country on the suggestion of moderators of Scotch assemblies, for the celebration on May 21 of the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Knox.

Among the contributions acknowledged by the American Board of Foreign Missions, there is one from a Chinese Sunday School. It was the largest Sunday School offering but one in the list.

Rev. C. H. Kelly, a Methodist minister is authority for the statement that of the twenty million children in the world's Sunday schools seven millions are in schools associated with Methodist churches.

Rev. W. J. Dawson's meetings in Boston, Mass., have been crowded. Universalists, Unitarians, and some Roman Catholic priests were among the audiences. Simultaneous meetings were held in Park Street Church, and Tremont Temple. Mr. Dawson preached also at the First Church in Newton, and at Harvard University.

President Roosevelt's Inaugural Address

"MY Fellow Citizens: No people on earth have more cause to be thankful than ours, and this is said reverently, in no spirit of boastfulness in our own strength, but with gratitude to the Giver of Good, who has blessed us with the conditions which have enabled us to achieve so large a measure of well-being and of happiness. To us as a people it has been granted to lay the foundations of our national life in a new continent. We are the heirs of the ages, and yet we have had to pay few of the penalties which in old countries are exacted by the dead hand of a by-gone civilization. We have not been obliged to fight for our existence against any alien race; and yet our life has called for the vigor and effort, without which the manlier and hardier virtues wither away.

"Under such conditions, it would be our own fault if we failed, and the success which we have had in the past, the success which we confidently believe the future will bring, should cause in us no feeling of vainglory, but rather a deep and abiding realization of all which life has offered us; a full acknowledgment of the responsibility which is ours, and a fixed determination to show that under a free government a mighly people can thrive best, alike as regards the things of the body and the things of the soul.

"Much has been given to us, and much will rightfully be expected from us. We have duties to others and duties to ourselves; and we can shirk neither. We have become a great nation, forced by the fact of its greatness into relations with the other nations of the earth; and we must behave as beseems a people with such responsibilities. Towards all other nations, large and small, our attitude must be one of cordial and sincere friendship. We must show not only in our words but in our deeds that we are earnestly desirous of securing their good-will by acting towards them in a spirit of just and generous recognition of all their rights. But justice and generosity in a nation, as in an individual, count most when shown not by the weak, but by the strong. While ever careful to refrain from wrongdoing others, we must be no less insistent that we are not wronged ourselves. We wish peace; but we wish the peace of justice, the peace of righteousness. We wish it because we think it is right and not because we are afraid. No weak nation that acts rightly and justly should ever have cause to fear us, and no strong Power should ever be able to single us out as a subject for insolent aggression.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

"Our relations with the other Powers of the world are important; but still more important are our relations among ourselves. Such growth in wealth in population and in power, as this nation has seen during the century and a quarter of its national life, is inevitably accompanied by a like growth in the problems which are ever before every nation that rises to greatness. Power invariably means both responsibility and danger. Our forefathers faced certain perils which we have outgrown. We now face other perils, the very existence of which it was impossible that they should foresee. Modern life is both complex and intense, and the tremendous changes wrought by the extraordinary industrial development of the half century are felt in every fibre of our social and political being. Never before have men tried so vast and formidable an experiment as that of administering the affairs of a continent under the forms of a democratic republic.

"The conditions which have told for our marvelous material well-being, which have developed to a very high degree our energy, self-reliance, and individual initiative, also have brought the care and anxiety inseparable from the accumulation of great wealth in industrial centres.

"Upon the success of our experiment much depends, not only as regards our own welfare, but as regards the welfare of mankind. If we fail, the cause of free self-government throughout the world will rock to its foundations; and therefore, our responsibility is heavy, to ourselves, to the world as it is to-day, and to the generations yet unborn. There is no good reason why we should fear the future, but there is every reason why we should face it seriously, neither hiding from ourselves the gravity of the problems before us, nor fearing to approach these problems with the unbending, unflinching purpose to solve them aright.

"Yet, after all, though the problems are new, though the tasks set before us differ from the tasks set before our fathers who founded and preserved this Republic, the spirit in which these tasks must be undertaken, and these problems faced, if our duty is to be well done, remains essentially unchanged. We know that self-government is difficult. We know that no people needs such high traits of character as that people which seeks to govern its affairs aright through the freely-expressed will of the free men who compose it. But we have faith that we shall not prove false to the memories of the men of the mighty past. They did their work, they left us the splendid heritage we now enjoy. We in our turn have an assured confidence that we shall be able to leave this heritage unwasted and enlarged to our children and our children's children.

"To do so, we must show, not merely in great crises, but in the every-day affairs of life, the qualities of practical intelligence, of courage, of hardihood and endurance, and above all, the power of devotion to a lofty ideal, which made great the men who founded this Republic in the days of Washington, and which made great the men who preserved this Republic in the days of Abraham Lincoln."

WOMEN OF THE AMERICAN PUEBLOS

THE vast stretches of the desert, the wonderful clearness of the air which makes a mountain miles away appear to be close at hand, above all the intense blue sky, and day after day of cloudless sunshine, lead many people to compare our own Southwest with Egypt and the Holy Land. In fact, the brilliant coloring of the Southwest makes Italy, in comparison, look like a washed-out aquarelle.

In the Great American Desert, in the heart of New Mexico, is Laguna, an Indian pueblo or village, almost the only one situated directly on the railway. For this reason, it is very much easier to visit than the other pueblos, which range from twenty to seventy miles distant from any railway station, and can only be reached by a trip on horseback or in a mountain wagon.

Laguna is well worth a visit. When the trains approach the station, a long file of Indian women with tall jars of pottery on their heads, come down the trail from their pueblo to sell their wares to the tourists. The chief occupation of these women is the making of pottery, some of which is very artistic, though not so fine as that of Acoma, a neighboring pueblo, about sixteen miles away. The dress of the Laguna women is remarkably picturesque. Over their heads and around their shoulders are draped brightly colored shawls. Their skirts are short, and of a darker hue. On their feet are white buckskin moccasins, which, in order to protect the wearers from the stings of the cactus, or the bites of rattlesnakes, have a long strip which is bound round and round the leg, up to the knee.

The beauty of the Laguna women, and in fact of all the Southwestern Indians, is often an agreeable surprise. There is a popular superstition that all Indians are high cheek-boned, harsh-featured creatures. A trip to the Southwest would disabuse one of this mistaken idea. The features of these Indians are often as good as those of any European, and their eyes, hair and teeth are fine. As to the color of their skin, it is certainly not red, being often about the same color as that of the average Italian or Spaniard. As a matter of fact it is the Americans, who, from their sunburnt complexions, are sometimes called by the Indians of these parts, "The Red Men."

A WAR DANCE IN THE PUEBLO OF ZUNI, NEW MEXICO

The pueblo itself consists of adobe houses, built in terrace style. The upper floor is set back about six feet or more on the roof of the lower floor, a small flight of stone steps or a ladder connecting the several stories. In the village is an adobe church built by the Spaniards.

The Laguna women still cling to their picturesque native dress; but the men, under the influence of "civilization," seem to have given it up, wearing nowadays—except on occasions of religious festivals—civilization's own and hideous costume.

It is a sad thing to see the native life of a noble race crushed out by "civilization." If anyone wishes to see the most interesting part of our country, before it becomes entirely Americanized, he had better go there soon. "Civilization"—the kind that puts coal-scuttle hats and clod-hopping boots on the children of the desert—is doing its best to stamp out everything beautiful and picturesque in Indian life, and so far its efforts have been crowned with success. The Right or the Wrong

By GRACE BOTELER SANDERS

AS the train steamed into the little village of Benton Harbor one beautiful evening, there seemed to be an unusual stir about the town. I listened expectantly for familiar sounds, and was greeted by tolling bells; they seemed a legion.

A voluntary exile from my home, was I. Often looking back through the vistas of years, I saw in my mind's eye the town of my childhood nestling like a pearl in an emerald setting of luxuriant maples. As the train stopped, I saw the same picture. At the depot, the same people greeted me. Only the burly drayman was gone. I missed the familiar greeting, but in his place stood a sturdy son of Africa. He touched his hat lazily:

"Trunks, sah? Whar to?"

I was a stranger in my native land. Ah! time had wrought some change.

"What's going on?" I asked, for the bells rang so jubilantly and long that I smiled involuntarily at their musical din.

"It's 'lection day, sah. De 'Drys' dun beat!"

"Are you going up-town now?"

"Ya-as, sah."

I climbed to the seat beside him, and a dejected man took his place in the back of the wagon. After much urging the lazy horses took up their load.

"This is a queer time for an election," I resumed.

"Dat's a fac'," said the boy. "Lots ob uneasy folks dis time las' night. I reckon dey feel kinda happy now. We had local option fur some time, but some ub de men what used to keep s'loon had stayed hur, said they wuz glad to git into 'spectable bisness. Things went fine fur a year er two, but when a man sarbes de debbil fur ten years it's hard t' quit 'mejetly. Dey had a hankerin' fur de silber dollahs dey used to rake in, an' de easy work. 'Things wuz so slow,' dey said. So some ob 'em put dur heads togedder, an' figgered out a slick scheme. Dey got de writin's all reddy.

" 'We're 'bliged t' make a test case er de law won't stan,' dey told folk at didn't know bettah. People at did, nebber heerd a wud 'til de news come dat a new vote wuz gwin' to be tuk.

"De quality wuz jist fur yes. But dem s'loon men, fust one, den de odder, wuz sneakin' roun' in de conahs, like a cur dog, leadin' off ebery pore innercent thet dey could. Us niggahs cotched it wus, kase de white folks kin jist tell our folks mos' anything, an' they'll b'lieb it.

"De fight wuz awful. De preachah's wuked like Turks. Why, de lumbah'man by de railroad spent more'n seventy dollahs; he wuz jist taren'. Swore he'd leab town if de 'Wets' beat.

"Bill Jones wuz jist as crazy. Dey say he had fifty bar'ls ob' whiskey ready t' open at midnight. I wondah what he dun wid 'em.

"I wusn't worried a bit, fur ye know de Man up above watches all dem things, an' always 'sides 'em right.

"But hur we is. Wh-o-a-o! I didn't tell ye how de dun ole Daddy Middleton."

He scratched his head reflectively, set one heavy foot on the trunk which he had just unloaded, and began all over again.

"One ob dem men had been awful good to him. The pore ol' man wuz lame an' blind; ye see, he's mos' ninety. Dis white man had keered fur him eber since his chillen died. Gib him a few vittles an' a han'ful ob coals now an' then fur his fiah; Daddy wuz a good ol' man. He'd been a chuc'h membah all his life, an' he wuz jist restin' on de promises which he said ober and ober to hisself all de time, hopein' de good Lawd 'ud come soon to take 'im home. Course de debbil come an' in de fawm o' dat white man.

" 'Uncle,' he asked, one cold mornin', as he brought in a bigger supply ob hot vittles an' usual—how good they smelled to de hungry ol' man. 'Uncle, you gwine t' vote wid us nex' week?'

"De ole man opened his eyes, sleepy-like.

" 'Wh-what's dat? What's dat you say, Massa Edd?'

" 'Why, vote like I do nex' week. If we git the saloons back there'll be lots o' work fur you pore folks. I'll take you to de polls wi'd dat fine black hoss o' mine,' an' he jist grinned.

"Uncle's face jist shined, but most the same minute he looked awful sad.

" 'Id like to suit you, Massa' Edd,' he said, ' 'an I've always wanted t' ride 'hind dat hoss o' your'n, but I couldn't vote fur dat s'loon. You fergot dey took my Willie. I'se sorry, but I jis' cayn't do it.'

"His voice wuz tremblin', and the tears jist rolled down his cheeks.

" 'What!' dat ole white man's face got red as a turkey gobbler, he wuz so mad.

" 'You won't eben do me a little fabor like dat. Me dats fed an' keered fur ye all dese years. After dis you can starb,' an' he jist grabbed up ebery one ob dem things, basket an' all, an' trowed em right through de winder. Den he stamped out, an' left dat pore hungry ole man a settin' thar a cryin' an' cryin'.

"Dat's de way Bruddah White found him, when he went in.

" 'I can't think it's right to vote no odder way, but 'Dry,' he said. 'What shill I do?'

"An' Bruddah White, he sez, sez he:

" 'I've gub you communion fur nigh onto forty years. All dis time de Lawd he nebber forsaked you an' he won't do it now.'

"So dey kneeled down togedder on de bare floor an' prayed, 'Lawd, deliber us from tem'tation.'

"De 'Wets' come seberal times, but he wouldn't budge an inch.

" 'I'm sorry, Massa Edd,' he says, 'but I'm gwine t' do de right ef I starb.'

"Dis mornin' de temp'rance folks took de ole man to de poles in a rubba' tired phaeton. Why, when he put de ticket in, his ole black face jist glowed. They tell me his vote turned the day. I hope de Christian folks won't fergit the pore ole man."

Suddenly, from an adjacent church tower, the old clock slowly measured off the time in strokes of eight.

"The idee! If I talk heer much longer, I won't git my hosses fed to-night. Want the trunk upstairs?"

He deposited my trunk in a place of safety and mounted the wagon's high seat. Then, clucking to the impatient horses, rattled away.

Happily the days passed in greeting old-time friends. Everywhere I heard of the terrible fight between the opposing factions; and one day I bethought myself of the faithful darky, so turned my face toward the Middleton cabin, wishing to hear the story from the old man himself.

Before I reached the little home I heard his quavering voice in song. I opened the door softly.

Father Middleton, his black face shining, snowy beard immaculate, sat in his arm-chair lovingly fingering a worn Bible. His eyes were turned heavenward, and I knew by his tone, as well as the words, that he was in communion with his Maker.

How firm a found-a-tion, ye saints ob de Lawd,
Is laid fo' yo fa ith in his ex cel lent word.

The voice trailed off, quavering with the echoes. I turned, thinking I would steal away, but he saw me.

"Howdy! How-de-do, sah! Come in, will ye? Take a cheer."

After we had conversed for a time he told the old familiar story again; then added:

"De Lawd ce'tainly keered fur me in time ob' trubble. My cup'ords full to oberflowing. Massa Brown, he sent me a load ob wood, an' famah Jones brought spar' ribs an' sassige, when 'e butchered. Dar ain't been a day but some buddys remembered me. Praise de Lawd fur his marcy."

When we parted he was still rejoicing, and with the scene came the words:

"Never yet have I seen the righteous forsaken or his seed begging bread."

"HE JIST GRABBED UP EBERY ONE OB DEM THINGS, BASKET AN' ALL, AN' TROWED 'EM RIGHT THROUGH DE WINDER"

The Worth of Toil

THE noblest men I know on earth,
Are men whose hands are brown with toil;
Who, backed by no ancestral graves,
Hew down the woods and till the soil.
And win thereby a prouder fame
Than follows king's or warrior's name.

The workingmen, whate'er their task—
To carve the stone or bear the hod—
They wear upon their honest brows
The royal stamp and seal of God!
And brighter are their drops of sweat
Than diamonds in a coronet!

God bless the noble workingmen,
Who rear the cities of the plain,
Who dig the mines and build the ships,
And drive the commerce of the main.
God bless them, for their swarthy hands
Have wrought the glory of our lands.

Technical World.

GREETING FROM PASTOR WAGNER

Pastor Charles Wagner, of Paris, the celebrated author of The Simple Life, retains a lively and evidently a very pleasant recollection of his visit to the Bowery Mission in the closing days of last year, as is shown by the following letter to Dr. Klopsch:

"PARIS, Feb. 17, 1905.

"I have been so busy since coming back home that I have been unable to write more than strictly necessary letters. But I have to express to you my hearty thanks for all you kindly did for me in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It gives me much pleasure, and so it does also Mrs. Wagner and the children.

"One of my most impressive recollections is the visit I made with you to the Bowery Mission. I can never forget these men, and although they were down trodden and poor people, their friendly faces are with me still.

"God bless you in your great work.

"CHARLES WAGNER."

Helped by "Christian Herald" Readers

MISS MATTIE PERRY, founder of Elhanan Institute, Marion, N. C., the story of whose remarkable "call to service" was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago, writes as follows:

Our Father has graciously cared for us this cold winter. With our family of more than one hundred, we have not had a serious sickness. He has fed and clothed us, and enabled us to pay off part of our debts. This has been our best year. I am strong and at my post of duty myself again. Have received $207.00 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, and still hear from them. The Lord reward them abundantly. We enjoy the weekly visits of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The book Good Manners, is proving a blessing to the family. Long live THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its editors to bless humanity.

The Birds are Coming Back

THE question was asked the other day by a lover of birds, "How shall I coax the wrens to come and build near my house? I have trees and bushes close to it, and I have a pretty little house that I put up last season, in the hope that they would come, but they staid away."

A person who had been successful in persuading the little neighbors to locate very close to his home; answered that a good plan was to take a gourd-shaped squash, and, cleaning out the soft part, leave the shell, with an opening the size of a silver dollar. Hang this upon a tree, and the wrens will approve of it and adopt it as a home. The same authority said that these birds did not disdain old tin cans for nest-building. I pass this information along to any who may be interested.

On my table lies a fascinating little booklet, compiled by the Public Library Commission of Indiana. It is a sort of catalogue of the birds of Indiana, and is issued in the interest of the pupils in the schools of that State. Much of its collated instruction is applicable to other States in the middle belt of our great country. Nature study should be encouraged in our boys and girls. Their powers of observation are thus stimulated, and they learn to be kind and loving to the little creatures who come confidently almost to our doors.

The thought of the compiler of the little pamphlet in question, is one of suggestion and helpfulness. He wishes to stimulate teachers and children to study the birds. For this purpose he advises teachers to send to various places and obtain calendars of bird migration. A good one is published by the Springfield, Mass., Library. Lincoln Park, Chicago, publishes a bulletin of bird migration for the use of the Chicago schools. Lists of birds, with space for a note of the date, weather, and locality, are used by the University of Illinois, in field-work, in local bird-study. Children will soon become intensely interested in watching the birds, if encouraged to bring in a daily report of what they see. Prizes may be offered for the best bird compositions, and bird-talks may be given to children by bird-lovers.

Among the birds peculiar to the Middle States, and to be found in Indiana, is the blue jay, "a bird of eccentric and interesting habits, who builds a bulky nest in the trees." Of him Mr. J. Whitcomb Riley has written:

Mr. Bluejay, full o' sass,
In them baseball clothes o' his,
Sportin' round the orchard jes'
Like he owned the premises.

If a woman is growing tired of housework and sewing; if she feels the need of outdoor life and recreation with an object, no plan can be better for her to adopt, than that of taking an opera glass and going outdoors every day this spring, to make a study of our little feathered friends. She may easily interest her children, and the reward to herself in health and cheer will be most profitable.

There, too, are the darling little song-sparrow, the magnificent cardinal, the active sparrow-hawk, and the uncanny screech-owl. There is the neighborly wren, of whom mention has already been made, who likes to build his home near the homes of men. There is robin redbreast, always a favorite, and there are ever so many more; the meadow-lark, the mourning-dove, the oriole, the brown thrasher, the field-sparrow, the goldfinch, the swift, the kingbird, the catbird, the martin, the red-eyed vireo, the little peewee, the bob-o-link, the tiny humming-bird, the barn-swallow, and the chickadee. Of the bob-o-link, a poet has said:

When nature had made all her birds,
With no more cares to think on,
She gave a rippling laugh, and out
There flew a bob-o-linkon.

If your home is near a public library, you will find by the catalogue that many authors have written books or articles, or at least poems, about the birds. Lucy Larcom, Celia Thaxter, James Russell Lowell, Harriet Prescott Spofford, Phœbe Carey, Louisa M. Alcott, R. W. Emerson, Alice Carey, J. G. Whittier, Sydney Lanier, Maurice Thompson, John Burroughs, T. B. Aldrich, Olive Thorn Miller, and Henry Van Dyke, occur to us among American authors who have written lovingly on this theme.

IN THE SPRING

A long day's work before him, the farmer strides along,
His life is not too easy; but, sturdy, true and strong,
He makes each day of duty as cheery as a song.

On the other side of the water, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, Browning, Tennyson, Owen Meredith, and Proctor are among bird-lovers.

It behooves us all to engage in a campaign for the protection of the birds. They are the true friends of the farmers, who may well spare them toll of grain and fruit for the sake of the war they wage on destructive insect pests. We are in their debt for melody and song, and for the gladness they bring us, and we should welcome them as harbingers of spring, our loveliest season, thrice welcome after such a winter as this has been.

They will come again to the apple tree
Robin and all the rest -
When the orchard branches are fair to see,
In the snow of the blossom dressed:
And the prettiest thing in the world will be
The building of the nest.

Weaving it well, so round and trim,
Hollowing it with care:
Nothing too far away for him,
Nothing for her too fair:
Hanging it safe on the topmost limb,
Their castle in the air.

Accidents Due to Mistakes

EVERY season brings its recurring tale of heart-rending accidents, due to negligence or mistaken judgment on the part of somebody who meant well enough, but failed in the critical moment, or ignored the obvious precaution. Last summer, the disaster on the river when the Slocum took fire, equalled in intensity of horror the previous calamity at the Iroquois Theatre in Chicago, only then beginning to fade from memory. The newspapers of every morning have their lurid reports—a child struck by a locomotive and killed, people run over by automobiles, or frozen in some catastrophe of the storm or the sea, or dying like sheep in the steerage of an ocean steamer. A party of friends, women belonging to the same church, go for a sleigh-ride and a visit to an out-of-town friend. They spend a pleasant afternoon, and return to their homes in the early evening. The tide of gladness is at its height. No danger is apprehended. But in the twinkling of an eye, at a grade-crossing, the fiery death sweeps down on them; the sleigh is overborne by the mighty engine rushing on like a whirlwind. Nine women, wives and mothers all, are in an instant slain.

The poet Sill says pithily, "Earth bears no balsam for mistakes." It would almost seem that mistakes are as pitiless in their results as intentional crimes. Surely a large proportion of the accidents that lay waste human happiness and make desolate peaceful homes, cannot fairly be charged to divine Providence. God may permit these things because he does not set aside natural law. Gravitation is not suspended by caprice on the part of the Deity. Whoever gets in under a falling rock, or himself falls from a height, may expect injury or destruction. Whoever, equally heedless, gets in the path of a flying express train, will be crushed. In nearly every such instance of calamity, the commonest prudence would have averted the dreadful happening.

On the mind of all who go abroad, of all in charge of the lives of others especially, the impression of responsibility should be deep and abiding. The American habit of taking risks should be broken up. We are all too ready, in this age and country, to accept a reckless chance. For the rest, let us thank God that the average man can generally be trusted to do his best, and let us so live that if the next hour should be our last, we may go to God with clean hands and a pure heart, and a faith that catches fast hold on the skirts of the divine goodness.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—Louise. Bridesmaids should consult the brides whom they attend, so that their dress may be in harmony with her color scheme.

—Mary. In addressing a letter to a widow, you may either use her Christian name or that of her husband. It is best to follow the usage she prefers. Mrs. Susan Wilcox, or Mrs. Edward Wilcox is equally good form.

—Bride. It is your privilege to have the sort of wedding you prefer. If you want a quiet affair, with only your relatives and intimate friends, let no one induce you to go beyond your means and wishes, and have what you do not care for, a large and expensive wedding.

—Archie. A man's duty to his mother never ceases. If she is in want, he should relieve her, and though he may not be able to maintain two homes, he should receive his mother into his own. Your situation is a little trying, but your wife will probably agree with you if you put the matter fairly before her.

—Mary. Certainly, you should use the utmost urgency to pay the minister's salary. It ought not to be left to the church ladies to raise the money. But if you choose to help, a supper, with a sale of useful articles following it, would be a very popular undertaking. Or, you might have an Old Folks' Concert.

A Helpful Suggestion

Scarcely any preacher fails to make his Easter sermon a source of comfort to the bereaved, and solace to those among his people who, by reason of age, or affliction, are approaching the end of life. It is confessedly a difficult topic, for the Scriptures give us but vague hints on the subject. We know little as to what there will be on the other side, or of what our life there will be like. Yet everyone wants to know these things, and all the more when many of their loved ones have entered the unseen land. We want to know what wise and pious men have thought and spoken on this entrancing topic. It is therefore a valuable service that Dr. Madison C. Peters has rendered by collecting in his wonderful work on The Great Hereafter, the most impressive of their utterances. The ablest men of our own and other lands and of every age have speculated on this absorbing subject, and Dr. Peters has, with extraordinary industry, compiled them in his exhaustive book. Pastors will find it a source of suggestion and inspiration unequalled in literature.

Uncle Rube's Easter Present, or The Book that Broke His Heart

It was Sunday morning, and all the family, except old Rube, had gone to church. He never attended divine service. It was his boast that he had not heard a sermon in twenty years. But on this particular Lord's Day the old man was restless. It was the anniversary of the death of Little Pearl. Just one year ago she had placed her wan ethereal hand in his huge calloused palm, and said:

"Father, you don't believe in heaven, but you will believe in it for my sake, and you will promise to meet little Pearl there; won't you, dear father?"

Old Rube choked a little. The hereafter was not a happy subject with him.

"Nobody knows anything about it," he growled, regretting the unfeeling words as soon as they were spoken. But old Rube belonged to that rather numerous class who never take anything back.

One year had made little change in the sceptic. Perhaps he was not so great a sceptic as he thought. Few are. The dull Sabbath morning, with its leaden March sky, and the rosebush tapping the window with its skeleton fingers, brought afresh to his mind the sad scene. Walking up and down the room, impatient of the long sermon that was keeping back the dinner, he paused before an open copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose flaming words caught his eye:

THE GREAT HEREAFTER

Old Rube read the article through, and bethought himself anew of little Pearl's question. In truth, he had thought of it a thousand times, but he would never acknowledge to his wife that it troubled him. He prided himself upon his ignorance of the future life, and would have called himself an agnostic if he had known the meaning of the term. Now, however, a good thought struck him. A snowflake sometimes lights on a lump of coal.

"I'll surprise Lucy," he said to himself. "I'll make her an Easter present, and it shan't be no little trinket; I'll send a $2.00 bill to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and get that big book. I guess I haven't been much of a comfort to her. Comfortin' ain't in my line, but that book'll do it all right."

It was a bright night when the expressman brought the Easter present, and Uncle Rube tore off the wrappings, exposing the beautiful volume, with its red edges and gold letters glistening in the moonlight. Aunt Lucy was making a call at a neighbor's, and her husband improved the opportunity to examine slyly the intended Easter gift. He chuckled as he read the contents of the chapters, and pictured the delight of his wife, who had all too little reading matter suited to her religious tastes. It seemed, too, that he was in some sense atoning for his rude answer to the question of his dying child.

Turning over the great shining leaves gingerly, as if they were too fine and clean for his rough hands, he lighted upon the touching chapter, "Shall we know our friends in heaven?" As he read, it seemed as if the spirit of little Pearl communed with him from the living page, and her last question smote anew his troubled heart. Gradually his eyes filled, and his trembling limbs faltered until he dropped to his knees with his face on the open page. When his wife returned, she found the hardened infidel in the holy attitude of prayer, the moonlight streaming over his white hair, and his broken voice murmuring, "Yes, little Pearl, I will meet you in heaven."

Not the next Sunday, nor ever again did Aunt Lucy sit alone in church.

"But it seems to me, Uncle Rube," said the minister when he heard the story, "that your Easter present to your wife was even a larger gift to yourself."

"Yes," replied the old man, "that book is like a blunderbuss; it hits at both ends."

THE LIFE OF CHRIST FOR US AND IN US

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

IN producing chromo lithographs, there is a separate stone and printing for each color. Only the finest quality of stone is used, and this is highly polished before the etchings are made upon it. The number of stones used in producing a picture varies from ten or fifteen, to thirty or forty. The twelve lessons we have had this quarter may be likened to twelve stones, each one of which has served the purpose of giving us some aspect of the character of the Lord Jesus. We cannot say that we have thereby gained a perfect likeness of our Saviour, for we have not studied his whole life. We have yet three months in which to complete it. Even then, we cannot hope to have a picture that can compare with the original, because our finite powers make it impossible to do the subject justice.

The first lesson gave us a background of heavenly light, with the outlines of a Saviour in the foreground. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men." He who was the light of heaven was made flesh, and dwelt among us. But we can scarce discern the picture. "The light shined in the darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not." We need the man sent from God, John the Baptist, to bear witness of that light.

Robertson, of Brighton, once wrote to his brother, "For many years I have been seeking God; but I have just been awakened to the fact that all these years God has been seeking me."

At a religious meeting in the south of London, a timid little girl wanted to come to Jesus, and she said to the gentleman conducting the meeting, "Will you pray for me in the meeting, please? But do not mention my name." In the meeting, when every head was bowed, this gentleman prayed, "O Lord, there is a little girl who does not want her name known, but thou dost know her; save her precious soul, Lord." There was a perfect silence, then away in the back of the meeting a little voice said, "Please, it's me, Jesus—it's me!"

The second stone gives us strong shades of sombre brown (for John was clothed in camels' hair and leather), him who proclaimed to listening and interested multitudes: "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." The attitude of John is humble, and when his hearers would do him honor, he declares: "He it is who coming after me is preferred before me, whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose." Multitudes thronged to hear John, and many repented of their sins, and were baptized, and so had their hearts made ready to receive Christ. John the Baptist was a sure and safe guide, leading to life eternal.

Let us pray for wisdom to recognize false guides in spiritual matters, who would lead us into the horrible pit and the miry clay. And let us also pray for grace to follow after safe guides, who will lead us into the realm of eternal truth and life.

The third stone, in tender gray shades, give us the first outlines of the church as it is to be founded by the Christ. We may discern two figures, then three others whom Christ joins to himself by saying, "Follow me." These are the first disciples, Andrew, John, Peter, Philip, and Nathaniel. They walk and talk with Jesus; they abide with him; they sit at his feet and listen to his teachings.

A young apprentice boy, having left home, yielded to temptation, neglected the reading of the Bible, disregarded the Sabbath, and gave up prayer. He was gradually declining from bad to worse, when one night a new apprentice arrived. On being pointed to his bed, he put away his luggage, and then knelt down to pray. John saw this. He did not laugh, as many boys would have done; his conscience troubled him, and God's Spirit strove with him. It was the turning-point in his life. He again began to pray and to read the Bible. He ultimately devoted himself altogether to the ministry, and became one of the most successful and honored of God's servants—John Angell James, of Birmingham, England. All unconscious was that new apprentice, when he knelt to pray, that there was one sitting at his feet, but he did his duty. We can never tell who may be learning from us, and it behooves us to be faithful in all things.

Particularly as parents and Sunday School teachers, we have a responsibility resting upon us. It has been truly said that we teach more by the life than we do with the lips. What we do, certainly has more force than what we say. But when words and actions point the same way, our influence is greatest.

The fourth stone gives us the ruby tints of the wine at Cana. Jesus shows his loving interest in human affairs, by being present at a wedding, and by helping on its festivities in providing wine when what had been furnished by the host is exhausted. There is wine in the picture, but no intoxication, for the wine is as the simple juice of the grape, with which he has at other times filled the clusters that hang upon the vine. The bridal scene suggests to us the sacredness of marriage, and the purity of life which both the bride and bridegroom should bring with them as the best part of their adornment.

A traveler tells of meeting a young man in a railroad train, who confided to him that he was on his way to his sweetheart to be married. On the second day of the journey, the young man came from the toilet-room cleanly washed and shaved, with clean linen and clothing neatly brushed. I said to him, "You must be getting near the end of your journey to where you are to meet your bride." "Oh, no," he replied, "I find that the best way to be clean at the end of the journey, is to keep clean all the way along." This good rule is as applicable to character as to the body. Ruskin once said to a company of young people, "Take heed while you are young that your hearts do not need much washing, else when they are old they will need wringing also."

CHRIST, THE HEALER, AT THE POOL OF BETHESDA

The fifth stone gives us the golden glimmer of hundreds of lamps which shine out from as many homes. We may discern the figure of Christ as he sits talking in his chamber on the roof with a guest, a man wise and austere in appearance, Nicodemus, a leader among the Jews. Nicodemus is a seeker after truth, and Jesus in earnest sympathy would help him to gain it. We may think that he did see the truth as Christ presented it to him, for not long after he bravely defended Christ in the Sanhedrin, and more than two years later he brought a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes to place about the dead body of Jesus, and himself aided in taking Jesus from the cross, and laying him in the tomb.

In the present time, a distinguished British scientist, Sir Oliver Lodge, is attracting wide attention because of conclusions he has reached in regard to religion and science. He says: "Assertions are made concerning material facts in the name of religion; these, science is bound to criticize. Testimony is borne to inner personal experience; on that physical science does well to be silent. Nevertheless many of us are impressed with the conviction that everything in the universe may become intelligible if we go the right way to work; and so we are coming to recognize, on the one hand, that every system of truth must be intimately connected with every other, and that this connection will constitute a trustworthy support, as soon as it is revealed by the progress of knowledge; and on the other hand, that the extensive foundation of truth now being laid by scientific workers, will ultimately support a gorgeous building of æsthetic feeling and religious faith."

He also says: "Realize that you are part of a great, orderly and mutually helpful cosmos, that you are not stranded or isolated in a foreign universe, but that you are part of it and closely akin to it; and your sense of sympathy will be enlarged, your power of free communication will be opened, and the heartfelt aspiration and communion and petition that we call prayer, will come as easily and as naturally as converse with human friends."

The sixth stone gives us the green shades of the grass in the valley, and the moss upon the well. It appears that Christ is no respecter of persons, for he is discoursing to a woman, a Samaritan woman, a bad woman. He tells her all things that ever she did, and by invitation he goes into the village where she lives, and preaches the Gospel to all Samaritans. How quickly the woman herself and many in Samaria believed in Jesus as the Christ, and became his followers.

The seventh stone gives us, in shades of tender lavender, the vision of Christ as a consoler and comforter, when he turned the sorrow of sickness unto death into the rejoicing of health, for that father who came to him with the request: "Come down ere my child die." He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. He has answered our prayers on behalf of dear sick ones. But when death had to come he has comforted us with a comfort that no one else knew how to give.

The eighth stone gives us, in shades of heavenly blue, the sympathizing Christ among the sick ones in the porches at the pool of Bethesda. He selects the most helpless and hopeless one of all. By the word of his power he cures him, and sends him away rejoicing, walking, and bearing his bed upon his shoulders. He meets the Pharisees, who severely condemn his healing on the Sabbath day. But Christ, the Lord of the Sabbath, tells us that it is "lawful to do good on the Sabbath day." All days and all times are suited to kind and loving deeds.

The ninth stone gives us the radiance of sunset glow, and we see Christ as a kind friend, who has the wish and the power to feed the hungry. It makes no matter to him that he has only five loaves and two fishes to feed a multitude of five thousand men, besides women and children, who have been all day without food. All of his bounty are fed, there is enough, and to spare.

The tenth stone gives us the cedar tints and the gold of the Temple, and we see Christ in his desire to satisfy the hearts of the people with peace and happiness, which desire they express in the pouring out of water from the golden pitcher on the altar of God. He cries out to them: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink." On the public drinking fountains in some parts of London are the words, "The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life." Those who come to these fountains find not only water but saving truth also.

The eleventh stone gives us dark shadings as we see Christ of necessity rebuking those who claim to be Abraham's children, but are in reality children of the devil. He is both severe and fearless in their murderous presence. He would free them from the bondage of sin, but their hearts are set against him. The drink evil holds more people in bondage to-day than any other cause. But God helping us we can break the fetters. The revival in Wales is reported as having already done more for temperance than years of legislation have done. A little boy's comment is said to describe a common experience. He said, "Dadda doesn't go to the Black Lion now in the evenings, but sits at home by the fireside, and we play chapel in our house."

The twelfth stone gives us, in shades of deepest blue, the vision of Christ as eyes to the blind. We seem to see the blind man at his bidding, washing in the pool of Siloam, and then coming back to the Temple, seeing. We discern the merciful Christ who would open the eyes of the sin-blinded Pharisees, but they would not let him.

THE COSY AND HOMELIKE DINING-ROOM

MRS. BALLINGTON BOOTH

PARLOR OF ONE OF THE HOMES FOR WOMEN

Real Homes for Working Girls

THE Volunteers of America, under the leadership of Commander Ballington and Mrs. Maude Booth, have opened in a number of the larger cities, homes, or boarding-places, where young women earning small wages may have a comfortable home and the protection they so much need while making their way alone in a big city.

The success that has attended the opening of these homes attests the need of them, and also demonstrates that they may be made self-supporting, thereby removing any stigma of charity, which is so distressing to a right-minded, self-respecting girl, willing and able to earn her own living.

Capt. Kate Muir, of the Minneapolis, Minn., Home, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"The Home here is not merely a boarding-place, but a real home. The house is large, but it has modern improvements, and girls coming there find it a home."

Capt. M. B. Arnold, of the Volunteers' Buffalo, N. Y. Home, says: "Our Home is for strangers in the city. In connection with it we have a free employment bureau, so that we need only tide over for a few days those who are without employment." The managers of this Home have just secured a substantial brick building, which is now the property of the Volunteers, and the permanency of the work is assured.

The cruellest side of the life of a poor working girl in a large city—if she is without a home—is not the bare, scanty, subsistence which is all she is able to pay for; it is not the day of toil, nor the lonely evenings and nights spent in a cold, comfortless bedroom; but it is the fact that such girls are daily and almost hourly brought into close contact with temptations to "better their condition." Warmth and light, good food and clothing, and a "good time" generally, are offered at a price which is spurned at first, as, with a heart full of courage, the young woman proudly works on; but by and by she grows weary, and dallying with the temptation, her moral strength weakens, as her life seems to grow harder day by day. There comes a time when the price is paid, and one more poor girl joins the army of the lost; not because she wants to, nor because she would rather be bad than good, but because she is not strong enough to withstand the hardships on the one hand, and the allurements held out to her on the other. Many a girl who is now stumbling along the dark way, could have been saved from taking the first fatal plunge had she been well sheltered and nutritiously fed; could she have gone home after her day's work, and spent the evening either in her own comfortable room, or in a pleasant sitting room, where music or some other innocent means of relaxation would have left neither time nor inclination for the baser sort.

Capt. Childe, connected with the Northwestern Department of the Volunteers, writes most interestingly of this work in Chicago. He says, "While the reclaiming of girls and women who have fallen, is a noble work, is it not better to get hold of the girl before she goes astray, and to lend her a helping hand? Throw around her the protecting care that helps to answer the prayer: 'Lead us not into temptation.' Hundreds and thousands of innocent and unsophisticated girls," he continues, "are swarming into the large cities of our country every year. They come to secure employment and earn their own livelihood. Full of hope and ambition and self-confidence, their dreams of future success and pleasure, amid the glare and glitter of a bustling city have made the world look bright before them; but alas, they know nothing of the snares and pitfalls in the city. The noise of traffic, the crowds of people, the confusion of city life bewilders them. Total strangers, many of them, they must first seek for a place to stay. Heaven protect the poor, innocent, unsuspecting girl at this stage of her career! Many a young girl dates her downfall from this moment, because of unwittingly getting into the wrong kind of lodgings.

"Right here is where the value and usefulness of these Volunteer Homes is demonstrated. By various methods —advertising in the public press, and by personal reception at the depots by authorized agents—this class of girls is informed of the existence of these Homes, where they may go and receive a hearty welcome, and be allowed to remain until they secure employment and are in a position to be independent. If they have the means, they are asked to pay a small sum weekly for their board and lodging, not more than the cost-price, however; but those who are not able to pay even this, are made just as welcome. The motherly matrons of these Homes understand something of the heart-hunger and loneliness of a girl coming to the city for the first time from a country town and a sheltering home."

GROUP OF WORKING GIRLS IN A "VOLUNTEER" HOME

While staying at the Home, the girls are privileged, if they will, to enter the Domestic Science classes and to learn cooking and general housework. As soon as they become proficient, positions are secured for them in private families. Or if girls prefer some other kind of employment, positions are obtained for them in reliable places. Should any, through sickness, be obliged to give up their position, they may return to the Home to rest and recuperate until they are able to go to work again.

The following incident, related by a Volunteer officer, is a good illustration of the beneficial effects of these Homes. A young girl in a country town came to the city, where she hoped to secure employment. It was the first time she had ever left home on such a long journey, and she had never been in a large city in her life. Her childish looks and unsophisticated ways attracted considerable attention on the train. Presently, a finely-dressed woman, wearing sparkling diamonds, costly jewelry and lace, came over to where she was sitting alone, and took a seat beside her. With winning smiles and pleasant words she soon ingratiated herself into the confidence of the girl. The woman was one of those unprincipled creatures who make it a business to come in contact with just such girls as the one with whom she had just forced an acquaintance. She handed the young woman a card with her name and address, and invited her to call. "It is my home," she said, "and they will take you in and keep you there. Just make yourself at home; it won't cost you anything; and as soon as I finish my business I will come home, and then we will see what we can do towards securing employment for you." The girl took the card, and when she arrived in the city she started out to find the address. Fortunately she learned, through the kindness of someone whom she asked to direct her, that the place was a notorious one, and that she had a narrow escape. She was then directed to the Home established by the Volunteers, where she was hospitably received, and in a few days employment was secured for her.

The strong Christian influences by which the girls living in the Homes are surrounded is not the least of their blessings. Many a girl has entered the Home and there found and learned to love and to serve Him, who came to "seek and to save that which was lost." Thousands of friendless girls have reason to bless the helping hand so generously extended to them. May the time come when these Homes may be multiplied in every city in the land.

New Finnish Congregational Church

The new church of the Finnish Congregational Society of Fitchburg, Mass., was recently dedicated. Services were held in the English, Swedish and Finnish languages. The pastor, Rev. Andrew Groop, was assisted by several local clergymen, as well as ministers from Boston and other New England cities.

The dedication of this building was an event to which the people had looked forward for many years, and there was great rejoicing among them, at the completion of a work for which they had made many sacrifices. The exercises opened in the forenoon; Rev. F. K. Hendrickson, of Quincy, Mass., spoke upon the meaning of the church building. He said that many of the present day try to argue that there is no difference between a church and any other building, since, if there be a God, he is everywhere else, as well as in the church. "But," said the preacher, "if we observe the lives of many who talk thus, we find that they cannot live a good life without the help of the Church."

From noon until one o'clock there were exercises by the Sunday School, singing by Rev. Mr. Blomgren, followed by a sermon by Rev. W. Sundelin, of Worcester. The afternoon was devoted to services in English, several local pastors participating. At 5 P.M., a Swedish service was held, with appropriate music by the choir. At 8 o'clock in the evening came the formal dedication exercises, which were of a simple but impressive character.

The Children's Court in Colorado

COLORADO has become one of the foremost States in its enlightened method of dealing with juvenile criminals. The "Children's Court" has been given an extended trial in that State, and is regarded as an unqualified success.

The county judge presides when children's cases are to be considered, and every effort is made to correct rather than to punish the offender. Mr. William Reasoner, probation officer at Colorado Springs, reports that he had charge of four hundred children last year. About fifty of the worst cases were brought into court, and all were proved guilty. Instead of sending them to a penal institution, thirty were allowed to go on probation, and eleven were sent for short terms to the State Industrial School. So far as possible, cases are left to the discretion of the probation officer. Boys and girls have been set right, and given a chance to redeem themselves, who, if they had been sent to prison, would have been corrupted beyond all hope, by the talk and influence of older and more hardened criminals.

The probation officer considers as his best helpers, many boys who have been brought under his care. They have reformed, and are doing good work among wayward lads of their acquaintance, by doing their best to persuade them to do what is right.

Christian Work in Japan's Army

THERE are now nine Young Men's Christian Association secretaries working among Japanese soldiers at five important military bases in Manchuria, including Dalny and New-Chwang. Permission to carry on this work was granted in the fall of 1904. After watching the work critically for three months, General Terrauchi, Imperial Minister of War, gave the following unsolicited testimonials of its value to the men from the viewpoint of the Japanese Government, in a conversation with Mr Ebara Soroku, M. P., Chairman of the House Committee of the Constitutional Party and President of the Tokio Young Men's Christian Association:

I wish to express my deep appreciation of the splendid work being done by your Association in behalf of our soldiers at the front. At first I had slight interest in the matter, thinking that, like many other propositions presented to us, it would pass over with little result. When your work was first launched, I had some feelings of anxiety concerning it, but I may say now that all apprehension has been turned into admiration, and I express both the opinion of men at the front and in Tokio, when I say that this work has proved successful beyond our expectations.

This is the most striking endorsement of Christianity ever given by a Japanese official. It is obvious that such words from a quarter so near the throne, will do much to place all Christians and Christian institutions even higher than at present in general esteem by the Japanese. By the middle of the spring, it is proposed to have fifteen secretaries at work in Manchuria, of whom about two-thirds will be Japanese.

Welsh Revival Hymns

The following translation of some of the Welsh hymns that are being sung at the present revival in Wales has been furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Rev. R. E. Williams, Butte, Mont.

Here is Love: 'tis like the ocean,
Mercy, streaming like a flood.
The Prince of Life! Behold him dying,
Us to purchase with his blood!
Who—oh, who can ere forget him?
Who would fail his praise to sing?
Such a love will ere be honored;
Through the heavens its fame shall ring.

Thou who send'st the lightning speeding;
Thou who tread'st the threat'ning wave,
Send the shafts of deep conviction
To this audience now to save!
Force the prison gates to open;
From the burning pluck the brand;
Cause the dumb to sing thy praises;
Lift the fearful with thine hand.

Wondrous powers of the Spirit,
To the heart when they do come,
Cause the barren ground a-yielding
Plenteous harvest, bounteous home,
Godly graces
Comeliest plants of heaven above.

The atoning blood of Jesus
To the weak will strength impart.
Thou wilt subjugate the mighty—
Death to our foes thou art!
Breeze refreshing,
From Mount Calvary descend.

In thy power trust I ever—
Great the work which thou hast done:
Death, and hell, and Satan, too,
Thou didst conquer all alone!
Calv'ry, Calv'ry!
In my mem'ry ever dwell.

In thy work my life is raptured;
In thy work is all my peace:
While this side the grave I tarry,
In thy work I'll never cease;
In thy work at home in heaven,
Having fled this life of pain;
Praising him, the Lamb of Calv'ry—
Such my work will ere remain.

She washes her delicate laces
With Ivory Soap suds, soft and warm;
The frailest in bottles she places
And shakes them—it cannot do harm.
If thoroughly rinsed with clear water,
They're wholly uninjured when dry
Because, as experience has taught her,
Ivory Soap has no free alkali.

The vegetable oils of which Ivory Soap is made fit it for many special uses for which other soaps are unsafe or unsatisfactory.

The Last Survivor of "1812"

IN the little hamlet of Dunn Brook, about twenty miles from Utica, New York, lives Hiram Cronck, the last survivor of the war of 1812. He makes his home with his daughter, Mrs. Sarah A. Rowley, and both she and her husband devote their time to him.

For several years he has been quite feeble and has an attendant. For a number of months he has been unable to leave his bed, yet his eyesight and hearing are still good, and he takes a deep interest in war matters and current events.

HIRAM CRONCK

Mr. Cronck will celebrate his 105th birthday anniversary, April 29, 1905. As on previous occasions of the kind, his friends will gather at his bedside to congratulate him and to leave tokens of their love. The aged veteran draws pensions from the nation and State, by which the cares of his declining years have been lightened.

He was born at Frankfort, N. Y., April 29, 1800, and he enlisted in the army as the War of 1812 was nearing its close. Personally he took no part in the fighting, but this was through no fault of his. His captain was Ichabod Davis. He marched considerably, lived in camp much of the time for five weeks, and then was honorably discharged with several other young men of his acquaintance, with whom he enlisted. On the day following his discharge he was in Watertown. During the night he was aroused by the sound of cannonading. In the morning he learned that a British gunboat had passed and had fired a few desultory shots at the defenses surrounding Sackett's Harbor. He was spoiling for a fight with the British, and again enlisted. He served forty days in his second enlistment, and assisted in the erection of log barracks along the shore at Sackett's Harbor. He was finally discharged from the service November 16, 1815.

The veteran has a natural aversion to being interviewed regarding his life history. At times he absolutely refuses to discuss his experiences, and it it is with the utmost difficulty that any information can be secured from him. He is an assiduous reader, and his keenest delight is found in the Bible, which is the true friend of his old age. He has been unable to attend divine worship for several years, and finds his solace in the Scriptures. The daily papers are read to him by his faithful daughter and her husband, whose tender care has never failed. The daughter is now more than seventy years of age.

Mr. Cronck is a total abstainer from intoxicants and tobacco. Longevity seems to have been common in his family, several of his brothers having lived to be over ninety years of age. His sturdy frame and his way of living have increased his lease on life, and he bids fair to live to reach his 105th milestone.

During the greater part of his life he followed the trade of an itinerant shoemaker. At the time the Erie Canal was excavated he was employed on the work, but afterwards resumed his trade. He is an honorary member of the Fort Stanwix Chapter, Sons of the American Revolution, and also of the State and national societies of that body.

Despite the fact that he enjoys a pension, the expense involved in his care and the maintenance of those in his family, are such that it is little more than sufficient to meet the demands placed upon it. The small farm on which he lives is mortgaged for all that it is worth.

Plans for his burial in Cypress Hills Cemetery, Brooklyn, have already been made. Here it is hoped that his body will find its final resting-place beside those whose lives were sacrificed for the sake of the infant colonies. He seems to take only a passing interest in the arrangements for the State funeral, which will probably be accorded him, but it is not expected that his relatives will object to the honor that the State authorities intend to pay his memory. The idea of a large military funeral is said to be against his wishes, but there is every probability that when he answers the final roll-call he will be honored in a manner befitting his services, and the fact that he was the last survivor of those who participated in the War of 1812. His last years are, as he would wish, quiet, devoted to his Bible and to prayer and surrounded by by those he loves.

Utica, N. Y. R. W. HALL.

A REAL GIANT IN LONDON

MACHNOW, THE RUSSIAN GIANT, NINE FEET HIGH

IN the present sceptical age, we have come to regard as myths the tales of giants who would stroll a hundred miles for their morning "constitutional," nibbling the while upon a pine tree or two, as a child does upon a stick of licorice. Yet a Russian, named Machnow, has appeared in London, and has compelled us to rearrange our ideas upon their childhood's basis.

Machnow is about nine feet high and well proportioned. His appetite is good, even for a giant. His usual breakfast consists of two quarts of milk, twelve eggs, and two large loaves of bread. At lunch he consumes three pounds of meat, vegetables, and five pounds of potatoes. For dinner he has soup, about five pounds of meat, some vegetables, and three pounds of bread. He consumes many quarts of beer every day. In the evening he has a light supper—ten to fifteen eggs, bread and butter, and a quart of tea. It is suggested, doubtless by some humorist, that Machnow was requested to leave Russia, in order that famine might not be added to the other troubles from which that country is now suffering.

Machnow is of an exceedingly mild disposition, and does not resemble, except in height, the ferocious gentleman that so much desired to make a meal of Jack-the-Giant-Killer. He has more likeness to the amiable mastodon, Bad-Orful, of Davy and the Goblin.

WAR!

GREAT VICTORY FOR GENERAL INTELLIGENCE

Mistaken Ideas Have to Surrender to Facts and Commonsense

The women of America bought many million cakes of Fels-Naptha Soap during the past year.

This shows how true it is that Fels-Naptha Soap, without hot water or hard labor, gets the clothes cleaner and whiter than any other soap gets them, even with the hardest kind of rubbing and boiling added.

It shows that women have found out how Fels-Naptha gets at the dirt and loosens it without ever hurting the clothes.

That's a great victory for commonsense and reason.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

H. M. S., Reading, Pa. Will you kindly give me the names of ten of the most popular American women writers, and the most popular work of each?

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward, Gates Ajar; Louisa M. Alcott, Little Women; Mary Wilkins Freeman, Pembroke; Harriet Beecher Stowe, Uncle Tom's Cabin; Ellen Glasgow, The Deliverance; Beatrice Harraden, Ships that Pass in the Night; Helen Hunt Jackson, Ramona; Amelia Barr, Jan Vedder's Wife; Florence M. Kingsley, Titus; Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, Poems and Essays.

Inquirer. 1. Of what nationality was President Buchanan? 2. Were his parents born in this country?

1. President Buchanan was of Scotch descent, but, of course, born in America. 2. His father was born in Ireland, belonging to a Scotch family living in that country. He came to America in 1783, and married the daughter of a farmer living in Adams County, Pa.

S. B., Lancaster, Pa. How many members of the present Congress are college men?

About two hundred and forty. The count was made from the Congressional Directory, and only those were included who had been at least three years at some college. There are quite a large number that attended college for one year, or graduated from some scientific school.

Inquirer. 1. What is the present name of the land that was called "Croatan" in Colonial days? 2. How is the succession to the title Duke of York carried out? 3. What are the points usually taken to determine a victory, when the victory is in doubt?

1. Croatan was an island off the coast of North Carolina, south of Roanoke Island, at the time of the attempted settlement there by a party of English colonists under Sir Walter Raleigh. Since then the sands have shifted to such an extent that it is difficult to determine its exact position, but it is probably incorporated with part of Hatteras Island, or Ocracoke Island. One hundred and seventeen persons were landed here in 1587, but nothing certain is known concerning their fate. It has given rise to a number of legends. 2. The present title of Duke of York has no more than a sentimental connection with the ancient Dukes of York, that figured as a reigning house in the fifteenth century, and was the rival of the house of Lancaster, in the Wars of the Roses. The title has been applied to some member of the reigning house since that time, as, for example, the brother of Charles II, in whose honor New York City was named. The Duke of York, who is now the Prince of Wales, selected, it is said, his own title, having become interested, in his boyhood, in the story of the great house of York. 3. In case of a drawn battle the method, we should suppose, would be the indirect results. For example, the battle between the Earl of Mar and the Duke of Argyle, in 1715, in Scotland. There Mar gained a doubtful advantage, but as he marched off the field the next day without following up his success, and left the troops of Argyle to continue their march, the victory has been given by some historians to the latter.

C. D., Seaside, Me. 1. How many wives had Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet? 2. What is that part of the world called at the present day, where the ships went to get material for Solomon's temple? 3. Was China a nation before the flood?

1. Exact number uncertain. 2. Tyre, whence most of the material for building the Temple came, was one of the most celebrated commercial cities in the ancient world. It was rather two cities, one on an island, the other on the mainland, at a point where the ancient Phœnician coast juts out into what is now the Mediterranean. Unlike most other independent commercial cities, it was not a republic but a monarchy. The once great city is now little more than a ruin. It is called by the natives "Sur" or "Zur." 3. There is no reliable means of fixing the time of the origin of the Chinese people. It goes back at least 2,200 years, B.C., when tribes from Central Asia, presumably emigrants from Babylonia, settled along the Yellow River. Chinese writers claim for their country a fabulous antiquity, but the very earliest Chinese historical landmark that is known to the outside world is the beginning of the reign of Yaou (2356 B.C.). According to Ussher's chronology, now no longer held as authoritative, the flood occurred about 2349 B.C.

Henry Clay, of Kentucky; appointed in 1825.

Inquirer, Rochester, N. Y. We would like to know, as we have had a discussion upon the subject, whether Robert E. Peary penetrated further north than any other Arctic explorer?

In April, 1902, Peary reached 84° 71' north of Grinnell Land. Previous to this, in April, 1900, Captain Cagni, of the Duke of Abruzzi's Italian Expedition, reached 86° 34' north of Franz Josef Land, this being 237 statute miles of the North Pole.

Effie D. P., Marblehead, Mass. Will you kindly give some information regarding the Yellowstone National Park? Where it is situated, its extent and natural features?

The reservation known as the Yellowstone National Park was set apart for public uses by an Act of Congress, passed in 1872. It covers a tract about sixty-five miles in length, from north to south, and about fifty-five miles in width from east to west, lying mostly in northwestern Wyoming, extending into the boundaries of Montana on the north, Idaho on the west. The park has an area of 3,312 square miles. The Rocky Mountain chain crosses the southwestern portion in an irregular line. The mountain peaks which hem in the narrow valleys are from 10,000 to upward of 11,000 feet in height. The highest of these are Electric Peak, not far from Mammouth Hot Springs, Mount Langford, and Turret Mountain.

Reader, Essex, Mass. Is there anything definitely known of the fate of the ship Mayflower, after she brought the Pilgrims to Plymouth harbor, in 1620?

It is said that the Mayflower made at least another voyage to Massachusetts Bay, and one legend is that she became a slave ship, and was wrecked while carrying a cargo of prisoners.

Stella A., San Antonio, Tex. Will you please name, in your CHRISTIAN HERALD or by letter, what are the Seven Wonders of the world?

They were, in ancient times: 1. The Pyramids; 2. Hanging Gardens of Babylon; 3. Tomb of Mausolus; 4. Temple of Diana at Ephesus; 5. Colossus of Rhodes; 6. Statue of Zeni, by Phidias; 7. The Pharos at Alexandria. The seven modern wonders are: Printing, Steam Engine, Electricity, Telegraph, Photography, Labor-Saving Machinery, and the X-Ray.

N. W. T., Gatesville, Tex. Why was it wrong for the sons of Eli to take the Ark of the covenant into battle?

Eli's sons were wicked men, whose vile lives had given offense to the Lord. (See I. Sam. 3: 11-14). Josephus (in chap. 10, book 5, of the Antiquities), describes their wickedness. Their very contiguity to the Ark was profanation. Besides, the Ark was brought, like some heathen fetich, into a scene of carnage and destruction, in the hope that its presence might operate as a charm to bring victory to the Israelites. It was like the elevating of an idol which was expected to work a sudden miracle. They trusted in the material Ark, instead of in the living God, and were punished accordingly.

A. K. W., Middletown, Pa. Does tradition give the name of the lad who had the loaves and fishes?

There is a legend which says that he was Ben Ezra, son of Marianne, a sister of Philip, one of the twelve apostles, and that he afterward became a bishop in the early Christian Church.

Subscriber, Omaha. 1. What is the present strength of the United States Army? 2. How is the total strength divided among the various arms of the service?

1. The army at present numbers 60,476. The act of Congress, February 2, 1901, provides that the total enlisted strength of the army shall not exceed at any one time 100,000. 2. There are fifteen regiments of cavalry, thirty batteries of field artillery, 126 batteries of coast artillery, thirty regiments of infantry and three battalions of engineers. There is a regiment of Porto Ricans and fifty companies of Philippine scouts.

N. R. R., Milford, Tex. 1. Have the missionaries been permitted to enter Lhasa, the capital of Tibet, since the British expedition to that place? 2. Is it a fact that the men greatly outnumber the women in that country, and if so, what is the proportion?

1. We believe not. Up to the present time the way has not been definitely opened for missionary work, although now it is very likely soon to be. 2. We have never seen it stated that the men outnumbered the women to any notable extent. Such an impression may have arisen from the fact that polyandry (one woman having several husbands), prevails in some parts of Tibet.

THE CZAREWITCH AND HIS FATHER

This picture is the first one that has been taken of the Czarewitch. His birth was the occasion of great rejoicing to his father, Emperor Nicholas, and to the Russian people, the latter considering it a good omen of victory in the Far East. The child has the historic name, Alexis, and at some future date will be the ruler of all the Russias. He is a remarkably healthy child, but receives, nevertheless, the most devoted attention from his mother, who seldom allows him out of her sight.

Y. M., Ontario. What is the greatest speed ever attained by an ice yacht?

In March, 1904, the Wolverine, owned by Commodore D. C. Olin, of Kalamazoo, Mich., went over a twenty-mile course in forty-two minutes. This is said to be the world's record. For short spurts in a high wind, there has probably been even a greater speed attained than this, but such cases are not a matter of official record.

Joseph P. P., Lakeport, N. H. How many nations are there in the world that believe in the religion of Jesus Christ?

The Gospel has now been preached in almost every land, with the exception of Tibet and possibly some few parts of central Africa. A majority of the civilized nations are nominally Christians, but Mohamedanism still holds sway in Turkey, Egypt, Morocco, Arabia, a large part of India, Persia; while various other heathen beliefs prevail in India, Burmah, Assam, Siam, China, and Japan, where the Christian element is yet small. In Africa, there are still vast sections where black heathenism rules, and in South America, which is ostensibly Catholic, travelers tell of gross ignorance and idolatry among the unevangelized tribes of the interior.

G. H. M., New Haven, Conn. 1. Who are the Presidents of the South American Republics? 2. What are the names of the Presidents of the Republics in the West Indies?

The Presidents of the South American States are: Manuel Quintana, of the Argentine Republic; Ismael Montes, of Bolivia; Francisco de P. Rodriguez Alvez, of Brazil; Jerman Riesco, of Chili; General Rafael Reyes, of Columbia; General Leonidas Plaza, of Ecuador; Jose Battle Y Ordonez, of Uruguay; Capriano Castro, of Venezuela. 2. The Presidents of the West India Republics in the West Indies are, Hayti, General Nord Alexis; San Domingo, Carlo F. Morales; Cuba, Tomas Estrada Palma.

L. R., Ithaca, O. 1. It is difficult to state which of the commandments is most frequently violated at the present time; but the most widespread violation is probably that which desecrates God's holy day. There are idol worshipers even in so-called Christian lands, and crimes of profanity, covetousness, dishonesty, lust, violence, and the dishonoring of parents are all too common. 2. How the Revival Began

WILLIAM T. STEAD, in The Review of Reviews, relates this incident of the great Welsh revival:

"The story of the very first outbreak of the revival traces it to the trembling utterance of a poor Welsh girl who, at a meeting in a Cardigan village, was the first to rise and testify. 'If no one else will, then I must say that I love the Lord Jesus Christ with all my heart.'

"The pathos and the passion of the avowal acted like an electric shock upon the congregation. One after another rose and made the full surrender, and the news spread like wildfire from place to place that the revival had broken out, and that souls were being ingathered to the Lord."

Mayor and Council Converted

The Facts About the Remarkable Revival at Ocean City, N. J.

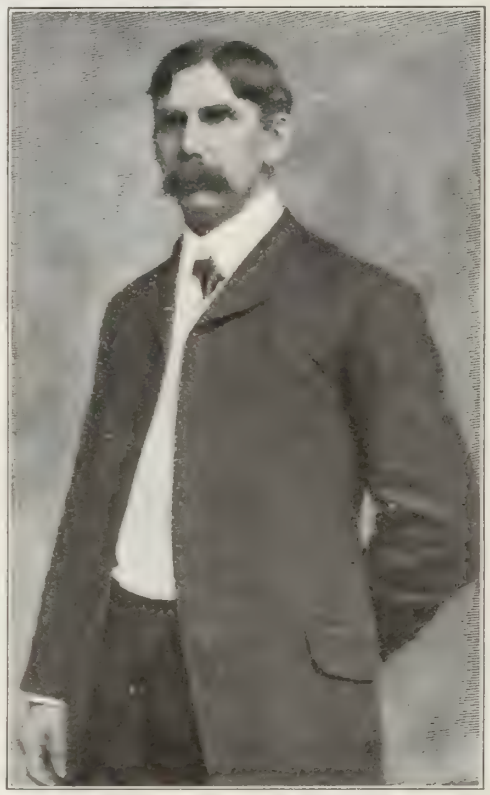
OCEAN CITY, N. J., a summer resort, with a normal winter population of 1,500 souls, has just experienced a remarkable religious revival. For more than a month, business has been practically at a standstill, and each evening crowds have filled the First M. E. Church, which has a seating capacity of 500 or 600.

One day during the past week, at the request of evangelist J. H. Weber, in charge of the meetings, many of the stores in the town were closed for two hours before noon, while services were held in the church.

Evangelist Weber came to Ocean City about a month ago, to assist in the revival meetings begun a few weeks before by the pastor, Rev. Pennington Corson. The announcement of Mr. Weber's coming served to draw a large congregation the first night he appeared. He won the young men, and they went every night. Presently a large proportion of the townspeople were to be found in the church each evening. Many grew to be warm adherents of the evangelist. He made his influence felt to such an extent, that it was a common occurrence for the evening services to continue until midnight. People of all ages arose for prayer, or made public profession of their conversion.

The climax was reached when some of the city officials proclaimed their belief. Among the first of these to do so was Common Councilman Harry Headley. He was soon followed by Councilman H. L. Smith. Next came the Mayor, Jos. G. Champion. A little later they were followed by the postmaster, E. M. Sutton.

The spiritual enthusiasm that has spread throughout Ocean City is notable. A scene unequalled in the history of the local church was witnessed on a recent Sunday morning, when one hundred people, from a child of eight years to men old enough to be grandfathers, were admitted to membership on the customary six months' probation. The young people's meeting in the early evening Sunday was led by Mayor Champion, who publicly declared that he had made the mistake of shirking his duty in the past, had squandered the greater part of his life in the service of the devil, but was now determined to fight for the Lord. He asked for the prayers of his hearers and advised those who had not already done so, to become followers of Jesus Christ.



MAYOR JOS. G. CHAMPION

At the same meeting, Postmaster Sutton said that he desired to do as much for Christ as he has done for the devil. He requested the prayers of the church members, and announced that he has "a lot of friends for whom he is praying."

Pastor Corson, who is continuing the revival meetings, says that the total number of converts thus far will reach one hundred and fifty, which will make the church membership about four hundred. As a result of the increase in the membership, members of the official board are already considering the advisability of building a new church, toward which they have $3,500, under a recent bequest.

AN AGED CHRISTIAN'S BIRTHDAY

MRS. O. M. FITZGERALD, the aged mother of Bishop Fitzgerald, celebrated her ninety-second birthday at her home in Newark, N. J., on the 15th of February last. Prior to this occasion she had been so ill that her friends despaired of her life. Invitations to friends were sent out as in the years gone by. The celebration was to take the form of a mid-week holiness gathering.

Up to within an hour of the meeting, Mrs. Fitzgerald was in bed, helplessly sick, but after earnest prayer she became stronger, and arose, assisted by attendants, dressed, and was led to her customary seat in the parlors, where the meetings usually were held. A large gathering had assembled, and she presided over the meeting for two-and-a-half hours. Though her voice previously had been so weak that she could barely whisper, her clear tones were heard now at either end of the large rooms. There were present some dozen clergymen of various denominations, mostly Methodists, all of whom participated in the exercises. They congratulated Mrs. Fitzgerald upon her long life of usefulness, and some attributed their success in the Gospel largely to the influence of her saintly life and teaching. Letters of congratulation were received from many ministers and other friends, several of which were read. One letter of special interest was from the children of the Home for the Friendless of the City of Newark, of which Mrs. Fitzgerald was the organizer, and is still president. The Board of Trustees of the Mount Tabor Camp Meeting Association sent a set of resolutions signed by every member of the Board, "gladly and gratefully recognizing the benign and gracious influence her life and labors at Mount Tabor had exerted."

The Prison-Gate Mission

Although only two months' old, the Prison-Gate Mission is already recognized as one of the benevolences of the metropolis that is doing a much needed work among a greatly neglected class. During February, Chaplain Munro, Superintendent of the Mission, met and advised with 320 released prisoners. Seventy liberated men visited the Mission, and 135 were aided with food and lodging. Employment was found for fourteen. Seventeen of these ex-prisoners have declared their intention, with God's help, of leading a new life, and have definitely accepted Christ. Readers who are interested in the work of the Prison-Gate Mission, can obtain all information by addressing the Superintendent, at No. 192 Elm Street, New York City.

Relieved By Absorption

The Foot Pores Now Made to Yield Up Acid Poisons From the Blood by Remarkable Discovery Which All Can

TRY FREE--PAY WHEN SATISFIED

Send your name to-day; you will get by return mail, postpaid—FREE To Try—a pair of Magic Foot Drafts, the great Michigan Discovery, which has proven such a remark- ably safe and sure remedy for rheumatism of all kinds that they are now being extensively imitated abroad as well as in this country. In England infringement against Magic Foot Drafts has recently been enjoined by the courts, thus protecting rheumatic sufferers against imitations liable to be injurious.

Magic Foot Drafts are worn inside the socking (without the least inconvenience) and they relieve rheumatism, chronic or acute, in every part of the body, by absorbing uric acid and other impurities from the blood through the large foot pores. Thousands of letters from relieved rheumatics—some of them the toughest old chronics in the country, can be seen by anyone calling at our offices. If the Drafts relieve all these people, why wouldn't they relieve you? Write to-day to Magic Foot Draft Co., R A 19 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich. You will get the Drafts by return mail. If you are satisfied with the relief they give, send us one dollar. If not, send nothing. You decide. A valuable new book (in colors) on rheumatism comes free with the Drafts. Send no money, only your name.

CHRISTIAN COMRADES*

ONE benefit, among many others, that Christian Endeavor has given to the Church, is the sense of comradeship. The present tendency in the denominations to co-operation, to friendly sympathy and cordial relations, is mainly the result of the fellowship in Christian Endeavor. Before its organization, the theory of brotherhood was formally admitted, but was seldom seen in practice. Personal contact between members of different denominations led to an increase of mutual respect and sincere esteem. Like the Scotchman who saw through the mist a formidable ogre in the distance, which, when it drew nearer, proved to be only a man, and, still nearer, turned out to be his own brother—Christians found through the bond of Christian Endeavor, brothers who had not been recognized in the distance. In the great conventions, men of various denominations learned how near they were together at heart, and how unimportant were their grounds of difference. So much service has the Society rendered, and if that were the only benefit, it would amply repay the labor it has cost.

Christ's pathetic prayer that all his followers might be one, is nearer fulfilment in our day than at any previous time in the history of his church. It is still far distant, but the tendency is toward unity, and long steps have been made. Uniformity, probably, will never come, nor is it desirable. One man loves order and ritual, while another desires freedom and spontaneity. Neither would profit in the church of the other, and yet in fundamentals there is complete unity. To love and serve Christ is the sincere desire of the true Christian, to whatsoever church he gives his allegiance. He is therefore at heart the brother of the man who has the same desire, and should be recognized as such. Comrades are all who serve under the same flag, though each is jealous for the honor of his own regiment.

The Missionary Call†

THREE missionary words are given in the texts associated with the topic.

The word of command; the assurance of power; and the commission in operation. The command is explicit and authoritative. It was extraordinary that the disciples, after so clear an expression of Christ's will, should have thought, as they evidently did, that the privileges of his Church were restricted to the Jews. They could not, however, keep the new wine in the old bottles. Christianity was to be the religion of humanity, and it soon burst the bonds in which they sought to confine it. Every man had an interest in it and Christ wished every man to know of it. Its adaptation proves its divine origin. The Mongolian, the Hindu, the African savage and the cannibals of the South Seas recognize its value when it is proclaimed to them and are moved by it as are civilized peoples.

The assurance of power, should have stimulated a wider proclamation than was made. It was manifested at the beginning as it is manifested in our own day. It does not rest on learning or eloquence, though it uses both forces, but is independent of them. It can bless the testimony of the simple and the arguments of the scholar. The halting speech of the missionary, speaking in a strange and barbarous tongue, has proved effectual in many a clime. The Holy Spirit gives power to the message, as Christ promised, and proves to be the power of God unto salvation.

Every one who has gone out to preach, has found, as did the Apostle Paul, that there are many adversaries to contend with. The more faithful the preaching the more enemies it will make. The Gospel stands for righteousness and purity of life, which must ever be disagreeable to men who love sin. The missionary has never been kept free from opposition. Many have laid down their lives in the conflict To this day, as we have seen in China, the martyr spirit is necessary in the soldiers of the Cross. Like their Lord, the missionary often falls under the hands of men who know not what they do.

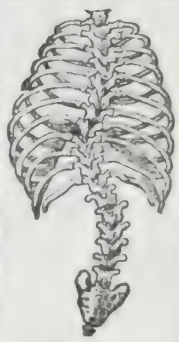
Crooked Spines Made Straight



If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of spinal curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the work being effected. Noted physicians in prominent medical institutions and in private practice are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness takes out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebrae is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is strengthened. There is a bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction, or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Write for our new book giving full information and references.

THE HOUSEWIFE'S BUSY SEASON

Spring Cleaning, and the Possibilities of a North Chamber

NOW is the time of lengthening days, when the busy housekeeper and thrifty homemaker bestirs herself in the annual "house-cleaning." This annual spring renovating formerly had far more terrors for the average housekeeper than in these more progressive days, when designers and tradesmen do so much to solve the puzzled woman's problem of how to make the most of a modest outlay of money in comfortable and artistic furnishings.

There is so much that is novel and artistic in materials and designs, so many little expedients that may be employed in remodelling and refurnishing houses, apartments, and single rooms, that one may take real pleasure in the work. Not the least consideration is the fact that many of the most beautiful designs and colorings of the more expensive fabrics and other materials are reproduced in goods of cheaper quality, so that they come within the limit of a very modest outlay.

It is intended that this department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall contain many helpful suggestions and hints, which an experienced housewife, who has access to all the large metropolitan shopping centres, can give to her sister home-makers. From week to week, all that pertains to the latest and most progressive ideas in home furnishings and surroundings will be presented to our readers.

Walls, ceilings, and floors are most important items in the renovating of an old house, and in the furnishing of a new home. With these three points satisfactorily attended to, the matter of furnishings is very much simplified. There are many beautiful wall coverings, aside from the conventional wall paper. A beautiful substitute is found in figured denim, which, in design and tint, very nearly approaches the most artistic and expensive tapestry hangings. This material comes in ordinary denim width, is sewn together with invisible seams, and is then stretched and tacked upon the wall. If one chooses, the wall can be panelled with moulding, when a really beautiful effect is produced.

Burlap is treated much in the same way, except that it is pasted instead of tacked to the wall, and sometimes is treated to a coat of paint and varnish, which resists dust and is easily cleaned, either with a dry or damp dust-cloth.

Both of these wall furnishings come in beautiful dull, rich colors, and also in lighter tints, the latter being more desirable in a room with a northern exposure. A room of this sort, which is almost hopelessly dull, and enough to give a sensitive person a fit of the blues, can be made almost to blossom as the rose, if finished and furnished with sufficiently cheerful coloring. Take, for instance, the "north chamber" in the average country house, and let us see what may be done at small cost with the beautiful new materials found in the large stores, where one has every facility for choosing according to taste and purse. We will choose for the walls nothing in dull, dark colors, no matter how rich they may be, reserving them for other rooms. We select a paper of delicate yellow, almost a cream groundwork, over which trail the loveliest vines, drooping with pink roses and green leaves; the deep border, composed of the same coloring, but conventionalized in festoons and set figures.

We are delighted to find that the same pattern is reproduced, both in coloring and figure, in cretonne, which we immediately decide to use in covering some of the old-fashioned furniture that has helped to make that room a cheerless apartment, shunned as much as possible by all the household. If one is not an adept with the upholsterer's needle, tacks and hammer, well-fitting slip-covers will serve nicely to hide shabby and ugly chairs and sofas.

A dressing-table draped with the same cretonne, set between the two north windows, helps to a great degree in infusing cheerfulness. The color scheme can extend to the bed, whose drapings may be of lace over pink, the round bolster giving the crowning touch to a formerly commonplace and uninviting article of furniture.

The treatment of the floor is also important. It can be stained, or painted in tint to match the walls, while rugs in which wood browns and greens predominate, harmonize well with the color scheme. Curtains of cobwebby Madras in yellow, give an added touch to the impression that the sun has changed its course, and is really shining into that former gloomy north room. Pictures in black and white, in dark frames, stand out beautifully on the background of yellow, and with the final touches which a woman's hand can bestow, the "north chamber" becomes a bower of beauty, at a mere nominal expense.

Furnishings of other rooms will be taken up in future articles.

A HINDU WOMAN'S SLAVERY

I MET the other day a lady, Miss Margaret Adams, who was trained at Somerville College, Oxford, and who has recently returned from grappling with this native woman problem in several parts of India (says a writer in the London Daily News). She has spent some time there as a missionary, and has passed almost daily behind the veil in the Indian homes.

"The most extraordinary thing," she said, "is the nature of the questions with which the women used to bombard me. They wanted to know all about Englishwomen. 'Is it true that they are allowed to go out of doors?' 'Are they allowed to eat before their husbands or at the same time?' 'Are they never beaten?' 'Is there only one wife in each house?' And so on, with endless curiosity, like the chatter of children.

"It is becoming more the fashion among the best cultivated natives — both Hindu and Mohammedan—to marry one wife only. Some of them are ambitious to treat their wives as Europeans do.

"The beating of women is so much a matter of course that many Mohammedans would make it a condition before I taught their wives, that I should not beat them. The husband's mother is held in the greatest fear. There is a touching Indian proverb of the little wives: 'Mother-in-law, remember that you, too, have a daughter.' Then the remedies! Some are merely ridiculous, like pickled sparrows for consumption.

"Next to womanly curiosity about the outside world is their desire for a story of some kind. Uneducated and with few resources in themselves, they have the same yearning for a 'story' as small English children. I used to ask them whether they had a manger—which they generally have in the outhouse of an Indian home. Then I would tell them the story of the manger at Bethlehem, and they were delighted!"

Two Child Missionaries

WRITING to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from Chichecastenango, Guatemala, Rev. C. F. Secord, an American missionary, tells this interesting incident:

"A little incident occurred here recently, which manifests the interest children take in the Gospel. One Sunday afternoon, two little girls, children of two families of believers, quietly gathered their song-books and New Testaments, and without saying a word to any one, went to the neighboring town, six miles distant, where they sang the songs they knew. As a crowd of Quiches gathered around them, they explained the Gospel in their simple, childish way, many hearts being touched. They said that they had left home to preach the Gospel; that no doubt the Lord would care for them, as He did for the foreign missionary and his wife, who had left their homes to preach the Gospel in this country (meaning us), and that the Lord had said also, 'Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God.' Of course their parents were frightened at their disappearance, and search parties scoured the country. Not until the next day were they found."

JOHN'S TESTIMONY

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE key-text of the Gospel of John is John 20:31. "Many other signs, therefore, did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book. But these are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God, and that believing, ye may have life through his name" (John 20:30, 31, R. V.). (1) "That ye may believe that Jesus is the Son of God"; (2) "That believing, ye may have life through his name." And this life is from above, his life, the life of Christ in our mortal bodies. "Christ the life and the light of men." Every other religion is a dead thing, a thing of doctrine and ideas, or of forms and ceremonies. But faith in Christ's dwelling in us is life; it is a new being, with new powers, new ideas, a new language, a new perspective. It is not only life from above, but life for eternity. It is eternal; it is a partnership of the Divine nature; it is nothing less than indwelling God. Where this life comes in and takes possession, everything is changed. What an illustration we have of it in the Welsh revival! Hearts, lives, homes, families, businesses, churches transformed! Only life-power can do such things, and the life of God, coming down from heaven into man, has done it.

The witness of John the Baptist to the Lord Jesus, the Fountain of life, as to whom he was and what he came to do, was, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Grieved with the attempts of the Jews to make him to be some great one, John had disowned all their presumptions as to who he was. Not Christ; not that prophet. No; only a voice to prepare the way for another. And when that other came out of his obscurity, John, with great joy and intense adoration exclaimed, "This is he. This is the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." But John the Baptist was not only a verbal witness to Christ. In his spirit he was Christlike, filled as he was with the Holy Spirit. Like him who was meek and lowly of heart, he said, "I must decrease." Through the testimony of John, Christ won his first disciple, Andrew—then his brother Simon, whom he brought to Jesus; then their friend Philip, whom presumably they put in the way of meeting with him; then Nathaniel, whom Philip brought. Who have we brought to Jesus? If we are filled with the Spirit, we cannot help bringing souls to Jesus; it is our life to see souls saved. We know something of his unspeakable love; we know something of the misery of a life without him. But the living water (the Holy Spirit) must flow out and fertilize.

We come next to Christ's first miracle (or sign), and note how, being under the direct leading of his Father, he at once set on one side his mother's interference. "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." And then Mary, instead of resenting it, took her true place in the presence of him who she knew was "the Son of the Highest" (Luke 1: 32), and said to the servants, "Whatever he saith unto you, do it." The Lord, without so much as moving from his place, changed the water into wine. No power, but his presence wrought the miracle. "Fill the waterpots with water. . . Draw out now." This was all, but the "sign" was accomplished; the proof that more than man was in this simple carpenter of Nazareth.

Then see the way Jesus deals with an inquirer, Nicodemus. Kindly but clearly he took all the ground from under his feet by showing him that he was ignorant of the very essential for eternal life, and that it consisted, not in any mere opinion or doctrine; it was a life, and must come about by the birth of that life; a birth from above. No entering into that life but by Divine interposition; a life communicated from heaven, by God alone. This was outside of the theology with which Nicodemus was acquainted. "How can these things be?" And thus the ground was cleared for our Lord to tell him God's position towards fallen man. The Old Testament thought was, "What does God require of me?" But here was something quite new: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." No more questions from Nicodemus; he believed.

The United Cities Realty Corporation

offers to the man who expects to live an investment far superior to that offered by any life insurance company in America. The Corporation invests only in the highest class of income-producing city real estate, insuring absolute protection of principal and accompanied by a steady and increasing income. Its directors and officers serve without salaries depending for their compensation upon one-half the surplus profits after the preferred shareholders have received cumulative dividends at the rate of five per cent. per annum. The remaining half of such surplus is paid to the holders of the preferred stock in addition to the regular five per cent. dividends. The only salaries paid are for management and clerical work, amounting the past year to less than $4.500. The Corporation publishes the fullest reports regarding its business, and every shareholder is privileged to make a thorough investigation of its affairs. Provision has been made to loan ninety per cent. of the par value of shares should holders deem it necessary to borrow.

NEW YORK AVENUE AND FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN.
Purchased at about 25% less than real value. Produces 8%.

You can own an interest in these valuable revenue-producing business properties for $5. and upward a month.

The rental income of this group of buildings nets the United Cities Realty Corporation over nine per cent. on its investment. The funds used in the purchase of these buildings represent the small investments of thousands of people, among them many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are exactly the type of investment which created the great estates of the Astors, Goelets, Rhinelanders, Gerrys, etc., names known throughout the length and breadth of the United States as representing the very acme of conservatism and investment-success. Every building is a steady and continuous producer of revenue. Every building is so situated in the business district of its city as to insure an increase in value and therefore a constant increase of the value of each shareholder's interest. Shares, $120 each, are sold in blocks of five or more. Terms, $5 and upward a month.

The Last Dividend Paid Was at the Rate of Six Per Cent. a Year

We invite the inquiry of all non-speculative investors.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Subscriber, Saratoga Springs, N. Y. Will you please state what you think of mind reading? Do you think one person can read another person's mind?

Telepathy is yet in its infancy and is not accepted as a science, but rather as belonging to a class of intellectual or psychological phenomena which investigators fail to grasp or define. Unfortunately, like magnetism and spiritualism, it is at present largely in the hands of professional charlatans, who operate with the aid of confederates, and resort to all sorts of trickery to impose on the credulous and make money. Most of their successes are secured through collusion with confederates.

O. A., Pocahontas, Ala. Where can I get a complete history of the early Christians?

Write to C. V. Waite and Co., Chicago, for the History of the Christian Religion to the year 200. It covers practically all that you want.

I. A. S., Marcellus, N. Y. Montgomery's School History says George Washington was born February 11, 1732, but it has come to be February 22, by the difference in reckoning time. How was time formerly reckoned?

The first recorded celebration of Washington's birthday was in Richmond, Va., on February 11, 1782. It was celebrated there and in other places on that date until 1793, when February 22 was adopted, according to the new style. The Julian Calendar, which had been universally used by civilized nations from the year 46 B.C., was corrected by Pope Gregory in 1582, the discovery having been made that under the Julian, or "old style" system of computing time, errors had accumulated, amounting to ten days. Under the "new style," it was ordered that every hundredth year should not be counted a leap-year (excepting every four hundredth, beginning with 2000). Thus the difference between the natural and civil year was reduced to about one day in 500 years. The new system was adopted slowly by the different nations. Britain ordered the omitting of eleven days in September, 1752, by special parliamentary enactment; and this was adopted later in America. Russia alone, among Christian countries, now adheres to the old style calendar.

J. E., Limerick, Me. Is there any hope of a backslider being forgiven, if he repents?

Assuredly he will be forgiven. The Bible is full of promises to encourage him. The Prodigal Son was a backslider. So was Peter; and David's was an outrageous case. The passages you refer to, concern backsliders who do not repent. They are by far the larger number. It is extremely difficult to bring a backslider to repentance. He knows all about the Gospel, and having turned his back on that he is not to be won by its appeals. But if he is sincerely sorry for his sin, and will go to God penitently begging to be forgiven, God will welcome him, and, as Ezekiel says (18:22), he shall not be taunted with his misdeeds.

M. E. H., Richmond, Va. What course can an anxious mother take to win a wayward boy to a right life?

Your difficulty is one that is perplexing thousands of parents. Your main reliance must be on prayer. God can touch his heart and lead him to himself. You may aid in the work by tactful and loving treatment. Could you get some Sunday School teacher accustomed to dealing with boys to take an interest in him? Perhaps there is some subject in which he is interested that would wean him from evil ways, if you provided him with facilities for studying it. No youth is wholly evil, and if you study his character, you may find some good tendency which may be developed and prove a counter-attraction to his evil propensities. But never cease to pray for him. That is your real ground for hope.

Inquirer, Option, Kansas. Why was not Joseph, the husband of Mary, at the marriage at Cana described in John 2?

We do not know that he was not there. It is, however, generally supposed from the absence of mention of him, and from the fact that Christ on the cross committed his mother to the care of John, that Joseph died before Christ's ministry commenced.

Subscriber. 1. What is the significance of Candlemas Day? 2. Why is the weather of that day supposed to affect climatic conditions for the next six weeks? 3. What are the sun dogs, and in what way do they affect the weather?

1. Candlemas comes on Feb. 2, and is the celebration of the purification of the Virgin. The name "Candlemas," or "Feast of Lights," came into use after the introduction of candles into the services. All of the candles to be used in the Roman Catholic Churches throughout the year are consecrated at this time. Luther retained this festival, and it is still celebrated in most of the Lutheran Churches. 2. This is only a superstition with no foundation in fact. If the weather is cold at that time, it is said to indicate a cold spring. 3. Sun dogs, known to science as "parhelia," are bright spots, due simply to the reflection of light from the surface of minute ice prisms that are slowly settling through the air. They indicate atmospheric conditions, but have no effect on them.

W. W. D., Miami, Fla. What is meant by discerning the Lord's body in I. Cor. 11: 29?

There had grown up in the Corinthian Church a laxity in the observance of the Lord's Supper. It was being treated, as you will see in the following verses, as an ordinary meal. Paul wanted them to see how solemn and sacred the institution was. While not teaching transubstantiation, he wished them to perceive that the bread was a symbol or emblem of our Lord's body, and was to be received reverently.

A. D. R., Zion City. I would like to know the birthplace, and also something of the career of the late Dr. Deems, who founded the Church of the Strangers in New York City.

Charles F. Deems was born in Baltimore, Md., December 4, 1820. He graduated from Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., and became an agent of the American Bible Society in North Carolina. For five years he served as professor on the faculty of the State University, and then became connected with Randolph Macon College, Virginia. He gave up teaching to become the pastor of a church at New Berne, N. C., but sometime after became President of Greenboro Female College in the same State. He was the presiding elder of the Wilmington and New Berne districts. In 1865 he went to New York, and aided by the munificence of Cornelius Vanderbilt, established the Church of the Strangers.

Reader, New York. 1. Do you know of any good book dealing with agnosticism? 2. What is the meaning of the number of the beast mentioned in Rev. 13: 18?

1. One of the best we know is that by Dr. Faunce, entitled, Hours with a Sceptic, published by the American Baptist Publication Society, Philadelphia. 2. Among all peoples, letters have a numerical value, as you see them on the face of a watch. There are several systems. The Hebrew, the Greek and the Arabic are the chief. It is generally believed that the meaning of the passage is, that the incarnation of Satan, who according to prophecy, is to appear in the last days, under the title of the Beast or Antichrist, will be a man whose name is composed of letters, the numerical value of which will be 666. The Greek form of Napoleon is such a name.

M. G., California. 1. Are Andrew Carnegie, Pierpont Morgan, or John D. Rockefeller members of the Masonic Order? 2. Where is the present home of Miss Helen Gould?

1. We don't know. 2. Lyndhurst, N. Y.

L. B. H., New Britain, Conn. 1. Is Job 2:1 to be understood literally? Could Satan really intrude among the sons of God? 2. Is Job speaking of the resurrection in 19: 26?

1. No; the writer of the book proposes to show in his work that people who imagine that unusual misfortunes imply that a man is a great sinner are guilty of a cruel aspersion. He supposes a case in which Satan is to be convinced that man is a disinterested servant of God. That Job will hold fast his faith though he is stripped of his wealth and sorely afflicted. It is the prologue of the argument that ensues when Job's friends, knowing nothing of what has occurred in the heavenly court, charge him with sin. 2. No other meaning can be attached to the passage. Job is convinced that his physical organs are not required with which to see God. He believes his spirit will see him.

Mrs. S. E. C., Columbia, Tenn. Tell me about the Taj Mahal of India.

It is a mausoleum erected near Agra, by the Mogul Emperor Shah Jehan, to the memory of his beautiful spouse. It is held by artists and architects to be one of the finest examples of architecture in the world.

B. J., Antioch, Tenn. 1. Are the Gospels of Mark and Luke inspired equally with those written by Matthew and John, who were Apostles? 2. Was not the seventh day observed as the Sabbath by our Lord and his Apostles? Why then do we observe the first day of the week?

1. The Gospel of Mark is believed to have been prepared under the supervision if not the dictation of Peter. Internal evidence confirms this belief. The Gospel according to Luke was also the work of an eye-witness (see Luke 1: 2). He is not mentioned among the followers of Christ, but it is clear that he must, as he says, not only have been an eye-witness, but have had access to facts not referred to by other evangelists. 2. We observe the Lord's Day in commemoration of Christ's resurrection from the dead, which is of weightier import to us than the reasons assigned in the Old Dispensation for the observance of the Seventh Day.

Subscriber, Middlebrook, Va. 1. Is it wrong to send valentines? 2. Or to indulge in April-fool jokes? 3. How did so many names originate, such as White, Black, Pike, Lever, Spear, Orvin, Apple, and Green?

1. Not if they are of the proper sort. Scurrilous or offensive valentines should never be sent. 2. All practical jokes are in bad taste, and "April-fool" jokes are usually of that class. 3. The origin of names is too large a subject to discuss in The Mail Bag. Read it up in some good encyclopedia, under the headings of "Surnames" and "Names."

L. L. B., Conker, Kans. 1. Are the works of William Morris written in such modern English that a modern reader can enjoy them? 2. What is the subject of The Waters of the Wondrous Isles, The Roots of the Mountains, The Well of the World's End, and The Story of the Glittering Plain?

1. Most of them can be read without much difficulty. He imitated to a certain extent the style of the poet Chaucer, and some of the French poets of the thirteenth century. 2. The Waters of the Wondrous Isles, and The Roots of the Mountains, are both prose romances interspersed with verse. The Well of the World's End was suggested by an old Scotch ballad. It is in two volumes, and is a beautiful story of adventure, suffering and love. The Land of the Glittering Plain; or, the Acre of the Undying, is a story written in early English style. It is an allegory of humanity's struggle in its ascent. It has been compared favorably with Pilgrim's Progress.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

CONVERTS, PERSONAL WORKERS AND CHOIR MEMBERS, AT ONE OF THE GREAT REVIVAL GATHERINGS IN LOS ANGELES

THE WESTERN REVIVAL WAVE

SOME OF THE LEADING FEATURES OF THE REMARKABLE AWAKENING AT LOS ANGELES

By H. E. Du Puy

SOME ONE has said that the revivals with which we were visited in other days need never again be expected in this country; that the world has moved on, that new methods have come to the front, and that a new evangelism is necessary.

Such a one would have been greatly interested in the Los Angeles revival, and his views certainly would have been changed.

An evangelistic meeting, reaching all classes and conditions of society, rich and poor, high and low, saloonkeepers, gamblers and outcasts of every sort, has just been experienced in the city of Los Angeles. For three weeks and a-half, Revs. J. Wilbur Chapman, W. E. Biederwolf, R. A. Walton, Henry Ostrom, John H. Elliott, and W. H. Stough, with their singers, have been speaking in different districts of the city. The buildings have been thronged, the converts have been numerous. The city has been stirred as never before in its history, and undoubtedly the churches will be greatly strengthened by the accession of many new members. Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage stood in the front ranks of the city pastors, assisting in every possible way.

Some remarkable features should be mentioned in connection with these meetings:

First: The Midnight Service. The night was dark and stormy, the streets flooded with water, and the rain descending in torrents, and yet thousands of people paraded the streets singing the Gospel hymns, and finally stopping at one of the theatres, where a score of men who had been drawn from the streets accepted Christ. It was the universal testimony of the pastors that no such scene had ever before been witnessed on the Pacific Coast.

Towards the close of the campaign the evangelists called together those who had accepted Christ in their meetings, and gave them final instructions about uniting with the Church. In the central section, presided over by Dr. Chapman, hundreds came forward and bore glad testimony to the fact that their lives had been changed by the acceptance of Christ. It was estimated by some that as many as a thousand in this one night alone stood for the Saviour.

The last Saturday of the evangelists' meetings in the city the services were transferred to Long Beach on the seashore. Two churches and a large auditorium were filled. Then thousands gathered on the beach, where evangelists Chapman, Biederwolf, Walton and Ostrom preached the Gospel to the eager audiences.

EVANGELIST CHAPMAN AND SOME OF HIS WORKERS

The closing meeting of the Los Angeles campaign was held in the spacious First Methodist Church, at half-past ten A.M. The church was crowded to the doors. The lower auditorium was also filled and hundreds turned away.

Rev. Dr. McIntyre, the pastor of the church, made the public statement at this meeting that he considered the Los Angeles revival the greatest he had ever experienced in his ministry. He understood now something as to what Pentecost must have been.

Southern California is being greatly moved for God. Meetings are in progress in many of the cities. All these are but added indications of God's desire through his people to move the world.

The evangelists separated at Los Angeles, to visit different California cities. Dr. Chapman, with his singers, Messrs. Butler and Allen, spent a little less than two weeks at Redlands. The same deep interest was manifest there. A day of prayer was observed in which all the places of business were closed. As a result of the two weeks' meetings, it is expected that hundreds of people will confess Christ and unite with the churches.

The large picture given above is of the converts in the district where Dr. Chapman presided in Los Angeles, together with the personal workers and the members of the choir. On Dr. Chapman's left stands Dr. Robert McIntyre, pastor of the First Methodist Church; on the right, Dr. William F. Day, of the Congregational Church. Just back of him is the Rev. William Horace Day, Chairman of the Committee. The smaller photograph was taken at the "Beach Meeting." It is estimated by some that there were at least eight thousand people present. They were standing just in front of the evangelist, with the Pacific Ocean beyond them. On the extreme right of the picture is Rev. Robert A. Walton, evangelist; just next to Dr. Chapman and on his right, stands Evangelist W. E. Biederwolf.

The Soul's Vision and Confidence

A SERMON BY REV. WALLACE MACMULLEN, D.D.

"We see Jesus." We are constantly using physical figures to express intellectual and spiritual meanings. The eye is a symbol as well as an organ, and the soul uses its language when describing spiritual perceptions. Helen Keller declares that she sees through the tips of her fingers. We do not know that the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews ever saw Jesus in the flesh, but even if he had once enjoyed that inestimable privilege, he is not here referring to it. Those who had known him after the flesh knew him later in the way of spiritual acquaintance. They were not forced to be content with the fading visions of memory. By the Spirit's ministry they held their Lord in perpetual view.

It is perfectly clear that Jesus is the hero of the New Testament. He looms large upon its pages. Whatever estimate may be put upon him by the critics of to-day, to the writers of his history he was supreme. He was the reason for their writing and their toil. But the question arises had they proper perspective? Had they good eyes? Were they not deceived by their own enthusiasm? Can we by purely intellectual methods arrive at their conclusions and adopt their attitude? No. Theirs is a spiritual estimate and is reached by a spiritual route.

Some one has said that the Old Testament is the book of the Father, the Gospels and Apocalypse the book of the Son, and the Acts of the Apostles and the associated Epistles the book of the Spirit. There is a measure of truth in the division. But the book of the Spirit is not about the Spirit, it is largely about the Son interpreted by the Spirit. Jesus in all these New Testament pages is spiritually discerned. His exaltation is not the result of human enthusiasm but of spiritual enlightenment. The Spirit gives notice of his enthronement, interprets his sacrifice, explains the meaning of his brotherhood, prophesies his universal and everlasting triumph.

The Living Jesus

"We see Jesus." He is still visible. We need to insist upon the present tense. He is more than historical, he is actual. Said Paul, "Ye know that I delivered unto you first of all that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that he had been raised on the third day." We have sometimes wondered that the apostles gave so little attention to the earthly ministry of their Lord in their preaching and writing, neglecting his words in their letters and giving all possible emphasis to his death and resurrection. Was it not because they found in those mighty events, not merely the climax of the earthly life, but the beginning of the universal ministry and everlasting dominion of Him, who, though he had lived on earth, was now "higher than the heavens?"

If there is nothing tangible in Christian history except the historical Christ, and he difficult of access because of the imperfections of the record, then there is no Gospel, and all attempts to save something out of the wreck of what we fancied was a Gospel are useless. Christian faith is a delusion, and if persisted in will be a blasphemy; the apparent spiritual empire of the Christian ages is the flimsy fabric built by a pathetic but imaginative enthusiasm. But if the earthly history of Jesus is but the beginning of his redeeming life, then his death and resurrection are not its climax but its initial facts. They are to be insisted upon not last but first. They are introductory to redemption. These apostles, looking every day upon signs of his enthronement, feeling the power, the comfort, the rapture of his creative Spirit, could not but be absorbed in the contemplation of his heavenly splendor and his rapidly extending dominion.

The living Christ is still accessible. We may not be qualified to go into all the arguments about his history, but we are able to be sure about his present life. He is still visible. With Spirit-cleansed eye, we may look upon his heavenly glory and his earthly triumphs. The Bible is not a finished volume. The Chronicles are being extended every day; the Acts of the Apostles have ten thousand unpublished chapters; our eyes are blessed with the sight of new miracles of the mighty Christ. "We see Jesus." If we don't, then faith is useless, moral transformations have no divine cause, history has no worthy meaning. But we do see him. In the mouth of many witnesses the truth is established. He lives and reigns and reveals himself. Thank God!

The first item in the vision of this writer is the royalty of Jesus. He is King by the decree of God. He is exalted above all his fellows. The angels worship him. The sceptre is in his hand. He is adding new territories to his empire. His rule is to be permanent—Jesus as King! It is a modern truth. The foundations and outlines of his throne are becoming clearer to human eyes. His significance in the world's life is getting more evident. His influence is becoming—has become—imperial. Those who pretend to make a view or a forecast of history may revile him, despise him, repudiate him in whole or in part, but they cannot ignore him. He is indubitably in command of souls, of tendencies, of movements, and his authority and power are royal. Pilate wrote over his Cross "King of the Jews," and wrote in Hebrew and Greek and Latin.

The Threefold Tribute

Hebrew is the language of religion. Clearly Christ is king of the world's religious life. The comparative study of religions only makes more clear his supremacy. Someone commenting on the new outpourings of his power which are now blessing men, said, "Christianity has an infinite capacity for revival." Truly it has, because its Lord is inexhaustible. "His worship grows young with the passage of the years." In this he is solitary. Critics sometimes assure us that his words are not original. They parallel some of them from other religious teachers. Some years ago a literary student announced that he had found the source of Shakespeare's plays, and from Boccacio, and Plutarch, and others, he quoted long sections of the dramas of the wizard. And so the secrets of Shakespeare's genius were laid bare. He was only a clever collector of literary gems. Vain attempt! What matter where he gathered his materials, since his was the fire in which they were fused, and his the molds by which they were recast in new and splendid forms! As well try to explain the diamond by finding some of its constituent elements in the soot of the chimney! And what matter if some threads of

REV. WALLACE MACMULLEN, D.D.

be found woven into other religious fabrics, or the ethics of Jesus be suggested by other teachers? His fame is not damaged even if such discoveries be made. By no such methods can his pre-eminence be disturbed. The amazing thing about his teaching is, not its novelty, but its authority. He is king of the human conscience. There is that in him which secures not only attention, but obedience and worship. To admit his ethical supremacy, and yet deny the divinity which makes him King, is to be illogical. If he is not, by virtue of what he is in himself, Lord of the conscience, then he is not the world's King, but merely its religious adviser.

And his royal title was given in Greek. That was the language of culture. King of the intellect! Certainly it is true that in Christian lands the fairest flowers of intellect are growing. There is some intimate connection between his rule, and clear thought and glowing imagination. The so-called Christian governments where intellect is oppressed are not Christian. Where he is really enthroned, mind is emancipated. And it is here in the realm of truth that his royalty needs to be more acknowledged. The minds he has set free are not loyal to him. The intellectual life of the nominally Christian world is not ruled by him. Oh for his intellectual enthronement! To have him King in the laboratories of science; in the halls of philosophy; in the classrooms of colleges; in the sanctums of editors; in the busy brains of the captains of industry and the leaders of trade; in the daily thoughts of his lovers! How wonderful it would be! How our hearts would sing and our pens glow with fire and our words breathe music, and our lives be holy!

The Homage of Power

And his title was written in Latin, the language of power. Said Julian the apostate, who had tried to overthrow the worship of Jesus the King, "O, Galilean, thou hast conquered!" It is the dying word of the baffled emperor. And more and more the King who conquered Rome and softened Goth, and Vandal, and Frank, and Briton, and Saxon, is getting control of the governments of men. The aspirations, the convictions, the demands which are breaking from the hearts of the sad and long dumb Russian millions, from nobleman and peasant, in music and poetry and fiction, are the speech of Jesus the King, and it is getting clearer and gathering power, and will inevitably have its authority acknowledged.

Another item in the vision of this worshiper who said, "We see Jesus," is his brotherhood. That is the theme of the second chapter. He is not ashamed to call us brethren. He shrinks from nothing that will make the brotherhood clear. He is partaker of the flesh and blood of the children of the family into which he enters. He goes down into the dreary suffering of his human lot. The brotherhood is no nominal thing. It means intimate, complete identification with us. How companionable he was! He loved society, had his intimate friends, yielded himself to the throngs. How sympathetic he was! He felt the timid touch of weary sufferers; knew where the helpless cripples lay waiting in pathetic patience for some one to help them; saw the blind who groped their way toward him, had a gentle touch and a word of power for the desolate lepers; knew where the sad souls lived and went to them; did not forget that people who listened to his blessed words were hungry, and fed them with royal bounty; made friends of the publicans and sinners whom the righteous Pharisees avoided. Dear, winsome brother! There is something beautifully attractive about him. Renan said that even rationalism could not look fixedly at him except on its knees.

The Perfect Sacrifice

Still another truth of the vision is his priesthood. And it is this that is made especially emphatic. There are some who are quite ready to admit the beauty of his humanity and even the fact of his Divinity, who deny his priestly work. But to deny this is to repudiate the Gospel. From authority to sacrifice is no descending scale. The vision which began in royal splendor does not dwindle in brightness as it reaches the agonies of sacrifice. It has rather revealed its innermost core of dazzling radiance. Not the divine authority of Jesus, and not his winning humanity, but his loving, perfect sacrifice is the brightness of his glory. First, the Divinity, then the humanity, then the sacrifice—this is the historical order.

The divine life passed into the human conditions in order to give itself utterly, and to show the measure of the love that prompted the descent, and to make its offer believable and effectual, it embraced the death agony which was the goal of the sacrificial way. To say he did not by the Eternal Spirit offer himself to God, is to rob the incarnation of meaning, to deny its terminal point. He who was our King became our brother in order to become our priest. His power and his love are brought to bear on our sins by means of his sacrifice. We need a new insistence on Jesus as a priest. The cross is his altar. His death is a priestly act. His sacrifice is sufficient and final. His eternal intercession is but the eternal display of his accepted offering. "We have redemption in his blood."

*Preached at Madison M. E. Church, New York. Texts Heb. 2 : 9, "We see Jesus." Heb. 7 : 25, "He is able to save."

The preaching of this truth has an important part to lay in all great revivals. An acute and sympathetic bserver of the great Welsh revival says that two great ruths are made prominent by the movement—the cross nd prayer. They are having a festival of the soul. 'raise is leaping from their hearts and rolling through heir valleys. And if you listen to their songs you will nd that the theme of their praises is the Cross—the ear Redeemer who climbed the hill of Calvary to die. t is this, the new vision of God's Lamb, which is filling Vales with irrepressible gladness. Joy is running over he land in floods. And it is this that is working moral ransformations. How often we have been told that reachers ought to hurl the thunderbolts of the law. We ave become lax in denouncing sin. And so consciences ave gone asleep and conviction of sin is rare. Hell eeds to be restored to pulpit favor. Now look at the icts. Over in Wales there are no sermons on any ubject, but all the passionate appeals which spring om plaintive or jubilant song present to the hearts and onsciences of the people the dying Christ. And the ision not only melts them, but cleanses them. Every- here men are confessing their sins and deserting them. he Cross is no sedative, it is a trumpet blast. It not nly stirs our emotions, it smites our sins and kills them. We see Jesus" our priest with his outstretched, pierced ands and offered life. May God make the vision com- elling!

And now notice the confidence which comes out of ie vision. "He is able to save." That kind of con- dence is not the result of a mere intellectual appraise- ent. There are problems connected with the Divinity, ie humanity, the priesthood of Jesus which offer abun- ant material for intellectual subtlety, but it is not that ind of consideration which this worshiper has been giv- g to the dear Christ. He has had a spiritual view. Through his eyes his soul has been looking. The light of longing and hope and trust has been brightening them. Passionate subjection to his King, love for his Brother, trust in his Priest, have cleansed his eyes and made their vision true.

> And he spread himself beneath it
> As when the bleacher spreads, to seethe it
> In the cleansing sun, his wool,
> Steeps in the flood of noontide whiteness
> Some defiled, discolored web
> So lay he, saturate with brightness.

And out of this personal transformation which the vision brought, there came this confidence—"He is able to save:" And naturally it is a confidence which accommodates the world—"Able to save all who come."

And out of that certainty obligation comes. If he is able to save all, we must be busy, for he has made himself dependent upon us. We are his body. His soothing touch upon dim eyes and suffering bodies is to be through our hands; his journeys of love through our feet; his messages of comfort and power through our voices. We are his body, Are his eyes blind, his feet lame, his hands paralyzed, his voice dumb? "He is able." There is a commandment in it as well as a thrilling assurance of victory.

This confidence, this experience, "He is able to save" establishes the vision as valid. The saving process is going on all about us. Souls are getting clean, tempers sweet, faces bright, homes happy. Peace is coming to troubled hearts and joy is making them sing. These are facts of current Christian history and they are not questioned. When drunkards are sobered and profanity ceases, and colliers sing and pray in their coal pits, and brothels are emptied, and saloons are emptied, and churches are packed with shining faces, as in Wales; these are moral miracles not to be doubted by any except hopeless cynics. And they are miracles which need to be accounted for. To admit transformed characters and transfigured faces, and then say that the vision which caused them is a delusion, is to be illogical. If the vision makes saints, it must be true. Moral beauty is a good test of the truth. The volume of Christian evi dences is not complete. Every soul saved is a new sentence; every revival is a new chapter. The best proof of Christ in his present life and blessed purpose, is a pure and jubilant soul. And we get no more satisfying glimpse of him than when we see his light stealing over human faces and hear the music of his praise breaking from human lips.

These are the things in which the Church needs strengthening to-day—vision of Christ and confidence in his saving power. Rhetorical certificates as to his character and glowing admissions about his moral influence, are not adequate. They will not do. A recent book on The Supremacy of Jesus, says he was a "religious genius;" declares that the facts all point to "a character of supreme sanity and vast spiritual nobility;" his authority is "the authority of a remarkable religious experience;" his Gospel is a fair ideal toward which the world is moving. Think of presenting that kind of analysis to the writers of the New Testament! If that had been the nature of their estimate we would never have had a New Testament! If the world's vision of him in all the Christian centuries had been dim as that, its journey toward his ideal would have been given up long ago in sheer faintness. Nothing less than a vision of the supernatural Christ and a profound and rapturous certainty of his power, not to improve, but to save, will reach the world's need.

God give us humility and love to clear our eyes that we may see, and set our hearts aflame with passionate adoration for Jesus our King, our Brother, our blessed Saviour! Amen!

MODERN KNIGHTS OF THE CROSS

REV. HENRY OTIS DWIGHT, LL.D.

THE nature of the work of selling Bibles in foreign lands to those who do not care for them, calls out the highest types of devotion and self-sacrifice; the out-of-the-way places where colporteurs find their duty, make them like skirmishers in advance of an army—pioneers who discover fields for missionaries to occupy; and their evangelistic visits constantly set in motion forces whose action does not cease when the man of the Book has gone away. One may say that this branch of Bible work is not only most romantic, but that it brings results which, almost more than those of any other kind of evangelistic work, can be traced and described by historians or idealized by poets.

In a small town in Bolivia one of these agents of the American Bible Society is going along the main street. Some well-dressed gentlemen near-by are looking at him curiously. Leaning against the wall to sun himself is a ragged, dirty, half-naked Quechua Indian. He, too, sees the man with the Bibles, and rushes toward him with extended arms. He is going to welcome him with an embrace, for it is a joy to see him. The Bible agent hesitates; all these well-dressed people are looking on. Shall he let this Indian kiss him in that public place? Why not hold him off and make him moderate his wild affection? But no, this poor fellow's heart has been touched. Perhaps in due time his soul may be won for Jesus Christ. So the Bible agent endures, at great cost to his feelings, and solely for the sake of his Master, the embrace of the unkempt savage and the unconcealed mirth of the gentlemen of the town. It is one of the acts of knightly heroism, of which many different kinds are demanded of the colporteurs.

In a little town in Mexico a blind woman is a colporteur. She is also an illustration of devoted energy. She takes a few books in a covered basket and is led through the streets by her little son, a bright-eyed chap of five or six years. Every day she comes home tired, but happy, because she has sold some Bibles or Testaments. The whole number she had sold was 1,700 at last accounts. She expresses in one sentence the reason why colporteurs of the Bible Society are willing to endure long tramps, storms, burning heat, cold, scorn, and violent attacks in their quest after people who need the Book and need to be taught and comforted by it. She says, "It is such a joy to be used by the Lord in his work."

The beginning of missionary work in Acayucan, Mexico, was made by a colporteur of the American Bible Society. When the priest heard that the Bible had been brought to town, he preached three days against the heretic and his books, threatening his flock with the major excommunication if they bought. It was only human nature for his hearers to go straight to the colporteur that they might see the evil of his books for themselves. He was daring; their need of the Book weighed more than the danger of the priest's wrath. So it came about that the four evenings he was there the colporteur had a Bible meeting every evening. These were the first Protestant meetings ever held in Acayucan.

Strange experiences the colporteurs have where the Bible begins to be bought freely. The people have no money, and they pay for the book in eggs and fowls; barter rosaries, crucifixes, idols and weapons. When things reach that stage the colporteurs have their reward in knowing that seed sown by their instrumentality is taking root. In the Philippine Islands, a colporteur at Malabon had an earnest talk, some three years ago, with a Signor Blas, whom he found in a position like that of a poolroom proprietor in New York, for the man made his living out of cock-pits used for gambling. The colporteur had that one talk with Signor Blas, and the same night he died of cholera. But his work remained. The keeper of the gambling house was converted, gave up his business, and is now a most powerful evangelist who has won many to Christ.

About the year 1859, some one's gift of money to the American Bible Society (whose gift it was God certainly knows) paid for the printing of the Book of Genesis in Chinese. Then some other person, chivalrously anxious to help, comfort and save the distressed, carried some copies of the Chinese Genesis to Japan and gave them away. As is the usage of those who do such work, he let them go in that newly-opened land like arrows shot at a venture. A boy named Neesima read the first words of the Book: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." He grasped the meaning of that sublimely simple verse, and, being taught by the Holy Spirit, he instantly knew that God is. We all know the result, through the story of the life of Joseph H. Neesima, who went to America because the Book had come to Japan through Americans, and returned to Japan, moved by the Christian and chivalrous wish to free his own people from bondage to sterile beliefs—to help them to rise from ignorance and become men. The point to be noted here is, that Neesima's life thus became worth telling in print, and has been well told.

A BOLIVIAN

Meantime struggles, and wars, and upheavals, wrought among the Chinese a strong willingness to learn things from Japan. This momentous change of mind toward Japan in the last ten years cannot have been accidental, unplanned by Him without whom not a sparrow falls to the ground. Because of this new tendency among the Chinese to learn from Japan, some one paid for printing the life of Joseph Neesima in Chinese. This unknown one played the part of a relay-magnet in a telegraph office. By his act the book sent out from the Bible Society so long ago, which made Neesima's life possible, extended the field of its work to China after more than forty years.

As promptly as if published for that very purpose, the life of the great Japanese Christian stirred to its depths the soul of a Chinese Christian in Amoy. The beauty and nobility of that life filled the man with regret that he was too old to prepare to use opportunities he now saw for the first time for benefiting his own nation. But the good Chinaman resolved that his son, Eng-ki, should have a chance to wield influence for Christ in China.

Now we have word that young Eng-ki of Amoy became a Christian in the school of the London Society's Mission, studied well, took the regular government examination, and that in July he came out first among the whole crowd of aspirants in the great province of Fu-kien. He is now in the Imperial University of Peking, preparing for the government service. The fact of a Christian's taking the first place in the great examination has become noised abroad, and men are looking into this thing, hoping to learn what led young Eng-ki to this brilliant success.

It is clear that results are yet to spring from the act of sending out the Scripture which began Neesima's life. More fruit is yet to ripen in China from the seed sown by the hand which took the Book to Japan. For the Word of Truth, once lodged in good soil in the heart must go on working—cannot stop working—in wider and wider spheres of influence.

Some Talented Bulgarian Girls

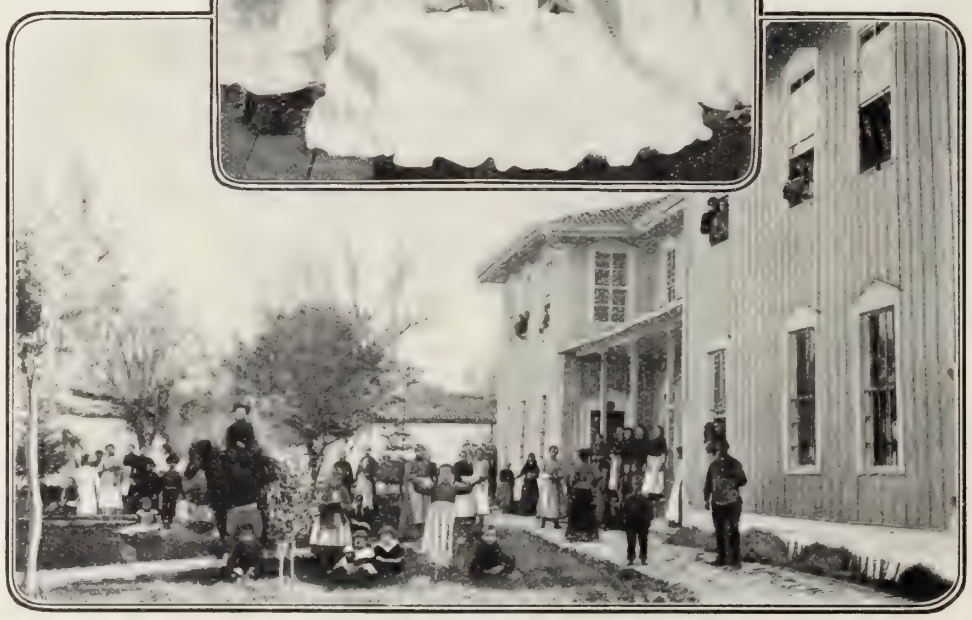
An important factor in the rapid development of the Bulgarian people during their twenty-seven years of free national life, is the American Boarding-School for Girls at Samokov. It provides for Bulgarian girls a good education, knowledge and skill in managing a home, and thorough Christian training. It has given to Bulgaria many able teachers, noble wives, and worthy mothers. Its students are noted for upright, high moral and Christian character, and for lofty aims in life.

The language of the school is, of course, Bulgarian. Such has been the success in the department of rhetoric and literature that the evening entertainments given by the literary society of the school are among the chief social events of the city. English is taught, also, and the girls, as a rule, become at home in it, and are not infrequently asked whether they have studied in England or America. There is also a French department. The graduates of this school were the pioneers in their country in writing, and in speaking in public at gatherings of literary and temperance societies, and by so doing have stimulated other women, graduates from the national schools, to participate in educational congresses and other great gatherings. The people appreciate the fact that Samokov students were for years the only women in the country that in this way tried to lift up their nation, and to create a public sentiment for the truest and noblest things in life. Their work is continued both in cities and villages throughout the land to-day.

For years, the Samokov school was the only institution for girls in the country where vocal and instrumental music was taught. The evangelical work in this province is also greatly indebted to this school, many of whose scholars are pillars in the churches, and active members in all Christian and philanthropic enterprises. The wives of pastors and preachers, with few exceptions, are women who for a longer or shorter period bave studied in it. A large number of the former pupils are wives of judges, lawyers, officers in the army, and other prominent men. One of the most intelligent and influential women in Sofia, the capital of Bulgaria, is Mrs. Bogdana J. Kasuroff, a graduate of this school, in which she received her education. She is the stationer to the court of Prince Ferdinand, and wields a fine influence for good in business, social and church affairs. She has three sons, the eldest a student at Robert College, Constantinople, and the second a cadet in the National Military Academy at Sofia. Such is her influence that upon her invitation, women of the highest social circles attend the mothers' meeting, held every month at the American kindergarten in the city.

The Samokov school has been very fortunate in its staff of American teachers. Following the first teachers from this country, the Misses Reynolds and Norcross, both from Massachusetts, the Woman's Board could not have sent one more worthy or capable, and with stronger religious principles, to be the principal of the school, than Miss Esther T. Maltbie, of Saybrook O., who for nearly thirty-five years has held that position. Resolute, well-equipped intellectually, and consecrated, she has done a splendid service for Bulgarian women, and through them for the nation. Like Mary Lyon, she insists tbat every girl be thorough in all branches of her course, but above all she strives to promote a true Christian character in each of them. Miss Maltbie has just returned home on furlough, after an absence from the United States of almost twelve years.

A CLASS OF BULGARIAN GRADUATES



THE AMERICAN SCHOOL FOR GIRLS AT SAMOKOV

Miss Ellen M. Stone, who twenty-six years ago exchanged her career as a literary woman in her own land for humble missionary life in Bulgaria, was associated with Miss Maltbie. With her royal nature and winsome ways she soon captured the hearts of her scholars, who obeyed and followed her, not because they feared, but because they loved her. Her graceful manners and excellent taste, imprinted on the receptive young Bulgarian woman, shine in many Bulgarian homes, and make the family hearthstone attractive. Miss Stone always maintained her warm interest in the school, although her immediate connection with it ceased years since, when she assumed the charge of the teachers and Bible-women in the field. After twenty years of faithful work in Bulgaria, she was called to transfer her residence and territory for labor to Macedonia, Turkey, in 1898, where, three years later, her terrible experiences in captivity overtook her.

Talented and worthy as these noble women are, they themselves would testify that without the faithful co-operation of their younger sisters, the Misses Sara E. Graves, Harriet L. Cole, Mary M. Haskell and Agnes M. Baird (the last two now in charge of the school), and the force of able Bulgarian teachers, almost without exception their own pupils, their labors would have been far less effective. Thus the American School for Girls at Samokov, which has proved, and continues to prove itself, an inestimable blessing to the Bulgarian nation, takes this opportunity, by the hand of one of its loyal daughters, to express its gratitude to all in this country who have loved it, and who have prayed and helped to make it what it is to-day.

A Barrel Conversion

THE Christian world is at the present time more or less interested in the various conversions going on during the enthusiasm prevailing under the pressure of the many important revivals in different localities. The news of such conversions brings much joy to the hearts of all who are desirous of the world's betterment, and the long expected age of purity and peace for mankind. Of course the classes of conversions are of various degrees and kinds, but all the same, in the end—as they all contribute to the general human welfare.

There was a class of "conversions" that came under my notice recently, which I considered was good food for thought and worthy of special mention. These conversions took place at Topeka, Kans.—the capital of one of our Prohibition States—the home of Rev. C. M. Sheldon, the popular and progressive preacher and writer. These came very noticeably under my observation through reading the following item of news in the St. Louis Daily Republic, dated from Topeka:

To morrow morning a lot of whiskey and beer of uncertain quality will be emptied into the sewer of the Topeka jail. The chief of police, who has been raiding liquor joint clubs and back alley saloons, has several wagon-loads of liquor in barrels, kegs and bottles, which, without ceremony, is to be spilled into the sewer according to law. Silence will reign while the chief smashes the barrels, kegs and bottles with an axe.

Here are barrels, kegs and bottles to be converted into kindling wood, and bits of glass and bad spirits converted into a jail sewer. Truly such conversions should be hailed with delight everywhere. It is far ahead of smashing saloon glass and lewd pictures. The axe of a "Chief of Police" will have a more lasting and abiding effect; the conversions, too, be somewhat better than the ordinary kind, for there can be no "backsliding"—the conversions will be sure to stick. It is a case of "once converted, always converted." I once sized up the character of one of this class of converts in a kind of poetical manner; and here it is—

A barrel of whiskey. What's that? Who knows?
'Tis a barrel of headaches, barrel of woes,
Barrel of words, ending oft with the knife,
Barrel of tears from many a wife,
Barrel of sorrows, barrel of strife,
Barrel of quarrels, ending some life,
Barrel of much unavailing regret,
Barrel of cares, barrel of debt,
Barrel of crime, barrel of pain,
Barrel of hopes ever blasted and vain,
Barrel of falsehood, deception and lies,
Barrel of maniac's shrieks, as he dies,
Barrel of "pizen," of which it is full,
Barrel from which many fools take a pull
Barrel of poverty, ruin and blight,
Barrel of terrors, growing each night,
Barrel of hunger, barrel of groans,
Barrel of orphans' pitiful moans,
Barrel of misery—terrible stuff!
Barrel to play on the world, Satan's "bluff."
Barrel of politics, used as "soft soap,"
Barrel that's made of so many a "tope,"
Barrel of "good resolutions" all gone,
Barrel that's made, oh! so many, forlorn,
Barrel that heart-rending tales could tell,
Barrel that's sent, oh! so many, to hell.
Parrel of bait used in Satan's old traps,
Barrel, the cause of so many mistakes,
Barrel of wickedness, barrel of woe,
Barrel that kills where'er it may go,
Barrel of "snakes" going down in each glass,
Barrel of death, alas! alas!
Barrel of which many millions have drunk,
Barrel that so many fortunes have sunk,
Barrel that's turned many days into night,
Barrel that's kept many out of God's light,
Barrel that's made many brutes of good men,
Barrel deceiving again and again,
Barrel that has been to religion a blight,
Barrel, the cause of how many a plight!
"Dirty Work" barrel, strong-smelling barrel,
Blasting old barrel—get out of our sight.

The President on Divorce

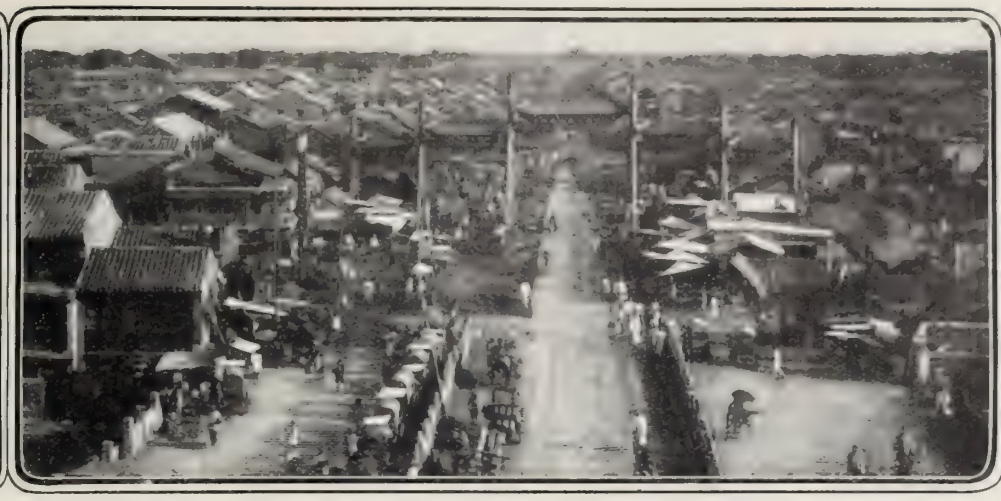
AT the recent meeting of the Inter-Church Conference on Marriage and Divorce with the President, in the White House, President Roosevelt, after listening to the address of the leading speaker, made a very characteristic reply. He said:

"There is a certain tendency to exalt the unessential in dealing with public questions, and public men especially are apt to get their attention concentrated on matters that have an importance, but a wholly ephemeral importance, compared with those that go straight to the root of things. Questions like the tariff and the currency are of literally no consequence whatsoever compared with the vital question of having the unit of our social life—the home—preserved. If the average husband and wife fulfil their duties toward one another and toward their children as Christianity teaches them, then we may rest absolutely assured that the other problems will solve themselves. But if we have solved every other problem in the wisest possible way, it shall profit us nothing if we have lost our own national soul; and we will have lost it, if we do not have the question of the relations of the family put upon the proper basis.

"One of the most unpleasant and dangerous features of our American life is the diminishing birth rate and the loosening of the marital tie among the old native American families. It goes without saying that, for the race as for the individual, no material prosperity, no business growth, no artistic or scientific development, will count, if the race commits suicide. Therefore, I count myself fortunate in having the opportunity to work with you and your colleagues in this matter of vital importance to the national welfare."

GENERAL KOUROPATKIN

GENERAL VIEW IN THE CITY OF MOUKDEN



MARSHAL OYAMA

THE TEN-DAY BATTLE of MOUKDEN

THE capture of Moukden, the ancient capital of Manchuria, by Marshal Oyama, and the utter rout of the Russian Army under Gen. Kouropatkin, ends the greatest and most protracted battle of modern times. Though making a desperate resistance, the forces of Kouropatkin were both outfought and out-generaled. It will be some time before an accurate estimate can be made of the Russian losses. Reports indicate that probably 100,000 prisoners have been taken, with hundreds of guns of various calibre, and a vast amount of military stores and other spoils of war. At latest accounts, the Japanese commanded practically all the roads to the north, and were striving to cut off or capture the remnants of the disordered and fleeing army.

Rumors were current in Paris and London that the Czar practically accepted the latest defeat as final, and was now prepared to negotiate for peace.

At 10 A.M., on Friday, March 10, the climax came, in the evacuation of all positions in and around Moukden by the Russians and the occupation of the city by Field-Marshal Oyama's victorious forces. For twenty-four hours previous to the abandonment of Moukden, the Russians had been burning their stores of supplies, and the great fires lighted up the surrounding country for miles. Fierce fighting marked the closing hours of the defence, but the dispirited Russians were unable to withstand the fury of the Japanese onslaughts, and position after position was taken.

RUSSIAN INFANTRY ON THE MARCH

GENERAL OKU'S CAVALRY

At this stage, Kouropatkin's forces were hemmed in on every side; Oyama's iron ring was rapidly closing. An effort was made to hold the fortified town of Fushun, which was the key to the only remaining outlet of escape for the encircled army; but it was quickly captured by the Japanese, who poured a rain of shells upon it from an adjoining hill.

Driven to the last extremity, Kouropatkin and his staff made a gallant effort to save at least a portion of the army. There are rumors that something over 100,000 prisoners, and practically all the Russian heavy guns, have been captured by the Japanese. Whether the general staff and the shattered remnant of Russia's once formidable host will succeed in making good its escape to Teiling and thence to Harbin, there to reorganize and "fight another day," is a question that does not seem to greatly disturb the victorious Japanese, who, both in Manchuria and at home, are already celebrating their splendid victory in the greatest battle of the war.

In the operations around Moukden, it was Marshal Oyama's plan to smash either Kouropatkin's force beyond all hope of reorganization, or to coop him up in the city and compel him to surrender. Kouropatkin attempted to hold the Japanese in check, at least until he could draw off his main force northward to Tie Pass, on the road to Harbin. Conservative estimates give the total forces in the field as follows: Japanese, 400,000; Russians, 330,000—the Japanese exceeding the Russians by about 70,000 men. By March 2, the Russians' left had been forced back, but the efforts to envelope their right were unsuccessful. The right retreated, however, until it was on a line with Moukden. Two Russian divisions that were sent to head off a wide flanking column advancing from the Liao River, toward Sin-Min-Tin, arrived too late, and found the town in the possession of the Japanese.

At all points, the Russians contested every inch of the ground, making repeated attacks with the bayonet. Puteloff, or Lone Tree Hill, at the west of the city, was attacked repeatedly by the Japanese infantry, which were as often repulsed. On March 3, it was reported that the Japanese had broken around the right and north of the Russian lines. The key of the Russian right, San-Lin-Pou, was the scene of awful carnage, the Japanese concentrating the fire of a hundred guns on the position, but they were temporarily unsuccessful. At the left of the Russian position, Kuroki was for a while held in check.

At this time the opposing forces resembled two crescents, the larger one of the Japanese stretching from the northeast of Moukden in a wide sweep to the south, and then bending westward with a curve to the northwest. The extreme right was commanded by Kuroki, Oyama having general charge at the centre, in the immediate front of Moukden, and Oku continuing the line to the left in the vicinity of Sin-Min-Tin, near the Liao River. Within this long crescent was the smaller one of the Russians, both flanks hard pressed, and the centre under a constant hail of shot from the heavy 11-inch guns of the Japanese, the largest yet used in the field outside of a regular siege. The left flank, made desperate efforts to hold its position, as a further retreat would force it back from the road to Tie Pass, and all hope of retreat to Harbin would vanish. The operations extended over nearly a hundred miles of country, most of it being comparatively flat. On this account there were few positions from which the generals could get an extended view of the operations, and all positions were connected by telephone. During our Civil War the field telegraph was used extensively, but this is the first time in which the telephone has been used on such a great scale in military operations. The fighting lines averaged were about ten miles from the city walls of Moukden.

Suddenly on March 5, Nogi and his Port Arthur veterans came with crushing force against the Russian positions west of Moukden. It was like lightning out of a clear sky. Kouropatkin fought desperately to save the city and the railroad. The battle raged within five miles of the walls, and the bursting shells could be plainly seen. Kuroki's operations at the east were a feint in order to weaken the line before Nogi's front. The Japanese charged with the bayonet, crying in Russian "Make way! we are from Port Arthur!" The only danger to the Japanese line was that the wings might be so heavily engaged that they might so weaken the centre, that Kouropatkin might pierce the crescent at that point. At the extreme east the Russians did advance, and held their position for some time.

On March 6th and 7th the battle continued, with Kouropatkin constantly contracting his lines and the Japanese trying to form a junction at the north. The Japanese and Russians were both in an exhausted condition; and the results of the battle depended as much on the physical fitness of the rank and file as on the positions held by the respective armies. Wednesday's fighting resulted in the capture by the Japanese of the forks of the military roads leading to Moukden on the west, and to Tie Pass on the north. The Japanese had succeeded in getting close to the city, but General Oku's forces were as exhausted as they were in August at Liao Yang. At this time, if Kouropatkin had not wasted his cavalry in fruitless reconnaissances, he could possibly have turned defeat into victory.

All the efforts of the Russian commanders were bent to avoid a situation like that of the capture of the French at Sedan, in 1870, where they were surrounded, forced into the town and compelled to surrender. The Japanese scouts had been able to form a junction at the north toward Tie Pass on the Russian line of retreat, and the Russians began to destroy their military stores and warehouses. The retreat at this time was conducted in good order, the rear-guard beating back repeated attacks of the Japanese infantry. The Russian rank and file fought magnificently, and kept up their spirits. The Japanese left was unable to throw up intrenchments, as the ground was frozen, so they carried bundles of brick, bound together with wire, for temporary shelter. By Thursday a strong force of General Nogi's army reached the vicinity of Tie Pass, and surrounded 80,000 of the Russian forces that had reached that point. The only hope left to Kouropatkin was to try and cut his way out with as much of his army as possible.

To Wipe Out Polygamy

THAT eminent authority on constitutional law, ex-United States Senator George F. Edmunds, at the request of this journal, sometime ago prepared for its columns an opinion as to the best method of dealing with the Mormon evil. In that presentation, which appeared in our issue of January 4, 1905, and was widely reproduced throughout the country, the distinguished Senator pointed out that the only way to stamp out polygamy was by the adoption of an amendment to the National Constitution. This amendment, he held, should accomplish two essential things, viz.:

First—It should prohibit polygamous marriages and plural cohabitation, and.

Second—It should require all persons taking office under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or of any State, to take and subscribe an oath that he or she is not, and will not be a member of any organization whatever, the laws, rules or nature of which require him or her to disregard his or her duty to support the Constitution and laws of the United States, and of the several States.

That Mr. Edmunds' sagacious advice has already borne fruit, is apparent from the fact that a joint resolution, covering precisely the same ground and in identical terms, has been introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Dubois. This resolution asks that the Committee on Judiciary, be instructed to prepare and report to the Senate within thirty days after the beginning of the next session, a joint resolution of both Houses, proposing to the several States amendments to the National Constitution to the effect above set forth.

This will be gratifying news to all right-minded men and women throughout the land. It is a step in the right direction. The passage of such a resolution in both Houses would be a distinct victory for national righteousness, though it would only be the beginning of the new campaign which aims to abolish polygamy by strictly constitutional methods. That campaign must be fought out in each State legislature, as well as in Congress. If the forces of Christianity, and the influences that make for good, clean, wholesome, upright American manhood and womanhood are united in the campaign, they cannot fail. Polygamy might have been abolished long ago had the way been clear to Congress. It is certainly clear enough now. And it lies within the power of every reader of this journal to aid in this movement for national purification, and for abolishing this evil thing, which has already laid so heavy a burden of suffering and shame upon a considerable portion of the American people.

At the proper time, we shall ask our readers to co-operate with us actively and energetically in this campaign. It is to be expected that the Mormon element in certain States, and especially those who are interested in the Mormon vote, will make a strong fight to preserve the political power of the Mormon hierarchy and to bolster up the vile, un-American institution, whose rottenness was lately exposed by the investigation before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. To offset this, a national organization will be needed, and it should be composed largely of women. When the campaign is transferred to the States, we hope to see the mothers and daughters of our land arrayed in solid phalanx in defence of the purity of the home and its protection from the Mormon contamination. Their influence, cast into the scale, will decide the issue.

Living Almanacs

THE average American can interpret the signs of the coming and going of the seasons better from the actions of the small boy than from any almanac that was ever published. You take out your spring overcoat as soon as you find it necessary to walk in the gutter, in order that the powers that be, or are to be, may play marbles unmolested on the sidewalk. The wind may be bitting cold, and the sodden gray of the sky may foretell a flurry of snow; but the small boy, as if moved by a common impulse, has got on his knees from one end of the country to the other, and there can be no doubt that spring is here or near at hand.

Bats and balls mean summer to the youngsters, and also to their fathers, if the crowds on the way to the playing fields on a half-holiday be any criterion. You may expect to have your windows broken, and to put bandages on bruised fingers for many weeks to come. The heart warms at the enthusiasm of the "Living Almanac," and you offer to take him fishing, and tell him about the large fish that you almost caught when you were a boy. Perhaps, urged by the delightful weather, you will take him for a long walk in the fields, hunting for early summer flowers, and you become vaguely conscious that the sun seems to give out a more generous heat than it did some years ago. Then as you lie down on some shady bank, where the bugs and spiders crawl over you, you try to think what a glorious time you are having.

When the football is brought out, and the faces of our young friends bear the appearance of having come into violent contact with the surface of various vacant lots in the neighborhood, it is high time to think of the winter's supply of coal. It does not matter that the earth has not doffed its tunic of Lincoln green for the buff coat of the cold campaign; for in the actions of the "Living Almanac," you have had a better sign of an early fall than the honk of the geese flying southward overhead.

Lenten Observance

FOR some years there has been in many cities an increase in the number of people who observe Lent. Not only in the Roman Catholic, and the Episcopal churches, but in other denominations the practice is spreading and is affecting more persons. It is altogether praiseworthy when its real meaning and purpose are kept in mind. As a preparation for the commemoration of the solemn scenes of Passion week, the abstinence from worldly pleasures, the self-denial and even the fasting, may be beneficial. It is good that at this time we should draw specially near to God, as we recall the sacred events of the Crucifixion and Resurrection.

It is, however, a mischievous observance if it is regarded as a penance. There is no merit in the observance. As a means to an end it is valuable in attuning the soul to divine things, but he who expects any other reward for it will be grievously disappointed. In some countries and by some people among ourselves, the week preceding Lent is a time for extra indulgence and the weeks after Lent are a carnival of dissipation. It is as if Lent was, in some sense, an atonement for the rest of the year, and even during its continuance the mind dwells on the pleasures past and the pleasures to come. Not so is Lent of value to any one. God takes no pleasure in the affliction of the soul. He does take pleasure in the desire to get nearer to him, which Lenten denial indicates. Thus not only in Lent, not only on Sundays, but throughout his whole life, there is in the true Christian a communion with God, an abstinence from amusements and dissipations which separate the soul from God. It is natural and right that the Lenten season be specially sacred, but it should be for the purpose of reaching higher summits of spiritual attainment, not a subsequent descent into the mire.

Triumph Through Defeat

"WHEN the Czar unsheathes his sword, the whole world trembles," is an old saying in Russia. While it might have been true in a bygone age, it is a pointless proverb to-day. Cowed by a rebellion at home, and his armies overwhelmed with disaster abroad, the "Little Father," once the idol of the Russian people, is a prisoner in his own palace, afraid to show his face in his capital city. National prestige, popular confidence and the esteem of his royal contemporaries are all swept away, and the once powerful ruler, to whose slightest wish the cabinets of Europe formerly gave instant heed, is now an object of universal pity and commiseration. His commands, which, a year ago, would have shaken a continent, fall unheeded now. His military greatness, so lately feared and admired, has been pricked by the foe he held in contempt, and found to be a bubble. His last crowning defeat in Manchuria shatters his hopes of conquest in that part of the globe. From Finland to the Caucasus, the peoples who have been held in subjection are struggling to burst their chains and to assert their ancient freedom. So tense is the strain that the huge, over-weighted Muscovite power is in danger of being pulled to pieces and the unwieldy empire dismembered.

"So passeth the glory of the world!" Surely He who holdeth all things in the hollow of his hand guideth them aright. Had Emperor Nicholas heeded the still, small voice of conscience, how different all might have been! That voice spoke to him in warning before Kishinev. It admonished him again on the eve of the denationalization of Finland. It adjured him to peace and led him to found the Hague Tribunal, and counseled him, though vainly, to stand by that one noble act of his career. Knowing the right, he was weakly led to choose the wrong. His most sacred promises of reform have been violated, his latest act being the revocation of his pledge to inquire into the workingmen's grievances, and the disbanding of the commission appointed for that purpose. Everywhere punic faith, broken pledges, weak recessions from the clear path of duty. Little wonder is it that conscience, with scorpion lash, now stings him with its rebukes and recriminations.

But what the people of Russia no longer hope to gain through appeal to the conscience of the Czar, may yet be brought about through his fears. Confronted by the collapse of the war and the ominous state of affairs at home, he may be forced reluctantly to yield all the reforms demanded. Europe is looking forward to the inevitable change, confident that it will come soon. Political representation, liberty of worship, relief from oppressive burdens imposed by the ruling class, lower taxation, liberal measures of education, a free press, equal justice to all the subjects of the Czar irrespective of race or religion—these are all much nearer realization now than a year ago. Thus a great victory may be plucked out of the blackest defeat. It has been a long, dark night for Russia, but daylight seems to be near at last.

Our New Serial

AS already announced, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issue of April 5, will contain the opening chapters of Florence Morse Kingsley's new serial story—

"THE RESURRECTION OF MISS CYNTHIA."

It is the story of a charming young New England woman who, in the midst of an active but worldly career, was suddenly appalled by her physician's announcement that she had inherited an ailment which would terminate fatally within a year. This startling news produced results which Mrs. Kingsley rightly calls a "transformation." What that transformation was, how it influenced many other lives, and how it all culminated most surprisingly at the "year's end," the author relates in her own felicitous way. The story deals with a problem that will set every one who reads it to thinking, and we predict for it a great popularity in CHRISTIAN HERALD circles.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST C. R. HAUDENSCHIELD's spiritual campaign in Butte, Mont., closed after twenty-two days of meetings, sometimes three services in a day. Many hopeful conversions are reported.

—EVANGELIST C. H. YATMAN has been conducting lately a series of meetings at Travis Park, San Antonio, Tex. At some of the meetings over 5,000 persons were present and there were overflow services besides.

—EVANGELIST E. A. FERGUSON writes: "I am at present engaged in a series of revival meetings at Wilmore, Ky., in Asbury College, of which Rev. J. W. Hughes is president. The school is temporarily abandoned, the class rooms are turned into rooms for altar services, and students are confessing Christ in their classes. President, faculty and people say it is the greatest meeting in the history of the college and town."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

New York's Strike

HOW dependent the citizens of New York are on amicable relations between the railroad corporations and their employees, was realized in the recent strike on the Subway and the Elevated Roads. Thousands of people living in the suburbs, and accustomed to travel to and fro by one of these systems, suddenly found their usual facilities cut off, and were compelled to use the surface cars. These were crowded to excess, even the fenders in front and rear were occupied, and on several lines men climbed on the roofs of the cars, riding there at the risk of life and limb. During the continuance of the strike the surface cars carried 700,000 more passengers daily than they usually do.

The cause of the strike was a demand on the part of all the employees, except motormen, for an increase of pay, amounting to ten per cent on present wages. There was also a demand for a reduction of hours for motormen and trainmen to a nine-hour day, and for tower switchmen to an eight-hour day. The existing rate of wage is $3 a day for motormen; $2.10 for conductors; $2 for switchmen, and $1.75 for ticket agents. The companies refused to listen to the new demand, and claimed that they held an agreement signed on the part of their employees accepting the existing rate of wages for a period of three years. A strike was accordingly declared, and on Tuesday, March 7, five thousand men quitted their work.

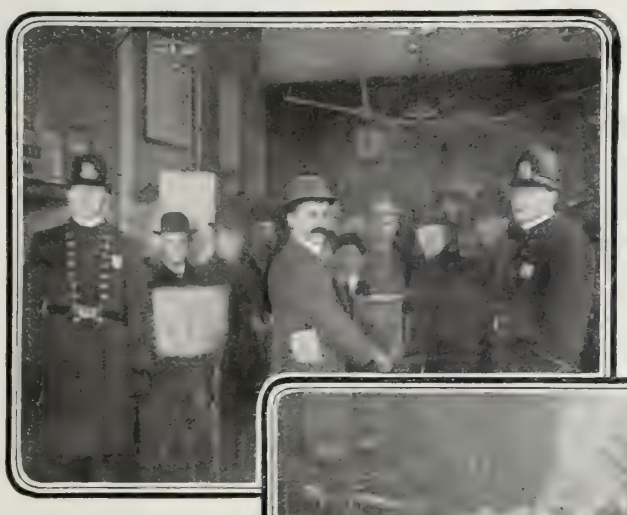
The companies had anticipated the strike, and had brought to New York from Philadelphia and other cities two thousand men to take the places of the strikers. These men were new to the work, and accidents, in which many were hurt, resulted from their inexperience. In the meantime, schedules were disregarded and trains were run at long and uncertain intervals. So extensive was the inconvenience to the city and so heavy the demand on the police force in keeping order, that the Mayor wrote to both parties, offering his services as arbitrator. The strikers gladly accepted the offer, but the companies, with the arrogance characteristic of monopolistic organizations, declared there was nothing to arbitrate.

On Thursday a new element developed in the strike. The national organizations of the trade unions to which the strikers belonged, sent their chief officers to New York, to see if anything could be done to restore peace and order. Their conference resulted in a repudiation of the strike by Warren S. Stone, Grand Chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. He ordered the men to return to their duties, under penalty of being expelled from the Brotherhood. Mr. D. W. Mahon, President of the Amalgamated Association of Railway employees, said that the members of his organization were not bound, as were the motormen, by an agreement, but the strike had not been authorized or approved by the national association, and he advised the men to return to their work at the old rates. The heads of the local union were indignant at the action of Chief Stone and President Mahon, and declared that the strike should go on in defiance of them.

It may be hoped, for the sake of the public and of the men, that the fight will not be continued. It would never have been begun, if there had been a right spirit on both sides. The employees appear to have been rash and ill-advised in leaving work at a time when so many men are unemployed and eager to get work under any conditions. The companies, too, have shown a greedy and selfish spirit. Rather than give up some of their enormous profits to their employees, they have incurred heavy losses and have been recreant to their duty to the people, from whom they received their valuable franchise. It is a pity that neither on one side nor the other was there some sensible man whose advice would have prevented the miserable conflict.

Is it so that there is not a wise man among you? No not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? (I. Cor. 6: 5).

POLICE GUARDING STRIKE-BREAKERS



A CROWDED SURFACE CAR

SUBWAY STRIKERS DISTRIBUTING HANDBILLS ON PARK ROW

A Thief in a Trap

A curious item of the news of Paris is the capture of a pickpocket in a trap. A crowd had assembled around a fallen horse in the Place d'Italie, and the pickpocket saw a lady whose bulging pockets offered all kinds of tempting possibilities. Without further ado he deftly introduced his hand, but instead of grasping the expected purse, found his finger securely caught in a new mole trap, which the lady had just purchased. With Spartan-like heroism he uttered no cry, but tried to withdraw his hand. The lady, however, became conscious that something was wrong, and the thief was seized by the bystanders and handed over to the police. The latter took him to the Hopital de la Pitie, where the amputation of his finger was adjudged necessary. Pickpockets might carry on their evil trade a long time without meeting with such an accident; but in one way or another, it is very sure that retribution will come to all transgressors.

The wicked is snared in the work of his own hands (Ps. 9: 16).

An Astronomical Discovery

The scientific world has been startled during the past few weeks by learning that the planet Jupiter has two moons that have never been observed before. Mary Proctor publishes some interesting details of the discovery. It appears that one of the first discoveries of Galileo, after the invention of the telescope in 1610, was that Jupiter had four moons. No others were seen until 1892, when Prof. Barnard, of Lick Observatory, found another moon revolving inside the others, and only 112,500 miles from Jupiter's centre. It is exceedingly small—not more than one hundred miles in diameter. Now, Prof. Perrine, also of the Lick Observatory, announces the discovery of two more moons. They travel in orbits outside those of the other moons, and at an enormous distance. The discovery was made by the aid of photography. The professor was examining a series of photographic plates, and noticed the two minute bodies changing their position in the plates of the series in such a way as to indicate their character as satellites. Three theories are advanced about them: One is that they were not seen before because of the imperfection of our instruments; or, that the planet has given birth to the two moons; or, that through its enormous magnetism, it has captured two of the asteroids which revolve near its orbit. If the moons are really asteroids, as seems probable, we have an example of two worlds being turned from their course into a new orbit, by the attraction of a mighty power. So in the world of spirit we are encouraged, by Christ's promise, to look for a more blessed change in this world.

I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me (John 12: 32).

Terrorized by Fire

In the crowded quarters of Cherry Street, New York, there was a fierce fire recently. It was in a house in which thirteen families lived, many of them foreigners. The alarm was given in the early morning hours, but the tenants did not understand. A policeman, however, heard the cry and turned in a call to the fire department. He returned and aroused the sleeping people. They were panic-stricken and could not be induced to hurry dressing and escape. When they realized their danger they became excited and nervous. One woman became paralyzed, but a fireman took her in his arms and carried her to safety. The fear of losing their little savings and their poor treasures completely unnerved some of them. One woman, who probably had spent hard-earned money on the purchase of a bag of coal, carried it to the window of her room and dropped it through. Unhappily it fell on a fireman, whom it injured so badly that he had to be taken to a hospital. The poor woman saved her wretched treasure, but at the cost of injury to the man who was engaged in the work of rescue. She is not the first nor the only one who has thought more of property than of human safety.

So are the ways of every one who is greedy of gain, who taketh away the life of the owners thereof (Prov. 1: 19).

OUR AGED "QUEEN OF CHRISTIAN SONG"

FANNY CROSBY'S EIGHTY-FIFTH BIRTHDAY TO BE CELEBRATED BY THE CHURCHES

A PERSONAL GREETING

Albany, N. Y., March 6.

DR. KLOPSCH:

Dear Friend—Through the columns of your excellent paper will you permit me to say to my many friends, that on Sunday, March 26th, my eighty-fifth birthday is to be celebrated. I know they will rejoice with me, and it will be a day of thanksgiving and praise to Him, who has enabled me to do the work for which at my birth I believe I was intended.

I am as happy as a bird, and in heart am only twenty-five years old.

And this my prayer that I may see,
Through the blessing of God, one hundred and three.

Lovingly yours,

FANNY CROSBY.

ON March 24, 1905, Fanny Crosby, the celebrated blind poetess and hymn writer, will have reached her eighty-fifth birthday. Many churches throughout the country have planned to honor her by setting apart Sunday, March 26, as "Fanny Crosby Day." A programme of Miss Crosby's hymns is being prepared, and pastors have signified their intention of preaching sermons bearing upon some phase of Christian hymnology.

They also propose making a gift of honor to the poetess, as a fitting tribute to the beautiful influence of her life and work. Nothing could be more appropriate than such a gift from those whose lives have been uplifted by "Rescue the Perishing," "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," and "Saved by Grace." Revival fires have been kindled in many hearts by the influence of the soul-stirring sacred songs of this gifted writer, and the proposed rallying day in the churches, it is hoped, will awaken a new interest in Christian circles, and that many wandering sheep may find the true Shepherd.

When, in the early years of the last century, a little daughter was born to John and Mercy Crosby, of Southeast, Putnam County, N. Y., the parents little dreamed that the child whose birth was welcomed with such joy, would always, after the first few weeks of infancy, be doomed to total blindness. But such was the pathetic truth, for at that time the child's sense of sight entirely disappeared. In her country home in the little valley, through which flowed a branch of the Croton River, the murmur of whose flowing water made music to her ears, Fanny passed the years of her childhood. The dancing measures of the little stream still linger in her memory. They spoke to her in a language which she understood, and she learned to translate them into her own words.

The happy-hearted child ever protested when tender sympathies were extended to her on account of her blindness. As the knowledge came to her that there was a sight-world in which she could have no part, it did not affect her elastic and joyful spirit, for her happy temperament threw sunshine over all her surroundings.

At the age of eight years, little Fanny wrote the following lines, as if to give notice that condolements were only wasted upon her.

Oh what a happy soul am I,
Although I cannot see,
I am resolved that in the world,
Contented I will be.
How many blessings I enjoy
That other people don't!
To weep and sigh because I'm blind,
I cannot, and I won't.

When fifteen, Fanny entered the New York Institution for the Blind, remaining as pupil and teacher, successively, until 1858. Here the vivid imagination, came under her broadening intellect's control, and the poetic faculty, which had from early childhood struggled for expression, found food and stimulus. The Bible became a never failing treasury for the blind girl, and she committed to memory the first four books of the Old Testament, and also the four Gospels. Many phrases of Scripture which adapt themselves to rhythmic expression, are found in Miss Crosby's hymns. Her mind is a storehouse, and the versatility of her genius is remarkable.

Exceedingly popular in their day, were the songs remembered by many a gray haired man and woman of to-day, as being sung in the old-time schoolroom. "Rosalie, The Prairie Flower;" "Hazel Dell;" "Music In the Air;" "Never Forget the Dear Ones;" if heard now, would send many a glance backward over the bridge of years, when childish voices joined in the tuneful melodies of these old songs. In 1858 Fanny was married to Alexander Van Alstyne, a pupil and musician in the New York Institution for the Blind; but it is as "Fanny Crosby," that the public have so many years known and loved the gentle poetess. She has lived her life of song through all these years, and finds in it still the greatest joy. She has made name and fame wherever the English language is spoken, and in almost all quarters of the globe her hymns have been translated, and are sung by Christian people everywhere. Multitudes have been aroused to a better life, and many have been comforted in their darkest hours by her hymns. Warm with the throbbings of a loving heart come the rhythmic words, with such power for good.

One incident will illustrate this: Miss Crosby was present one evening at a mission, when "Rescue the Perishing" was sung. A young man told the story of his wanderings, how, hungry and penniless, he was strolling through the streets one night, when the words of this hymn floated out through the door of the mission. Entering the hall, his heart was bowed in penitence as he listened to the words of the hymn. "I was just ready to perish," said he, "but the words of that hymn, by the grace of God, saved me." As author and speaker stood face to face, it was a scene long to be remembered. Tears flowed from sightless and from seeing eyes as well, and the whole audience was thrilled with the pathos of the meeting. And now, in the evening of life, the warm rays of sunset turning to gold, glorify the sweet face and form of her who has done so much for the happy uplifting of thousands.

FANNY CROSBY AT EIGHTY-FIVE
From her latest photograph

The plan for a "Fanny Crosby Day" has the lady's unqualified sanction. When it was presented to her she said, "I am very much pleased; I approve of the movement." No more fitting words could be found in which to close this brief tribute to Miss Crosby, than those from her own pen:

Yet a little while we linger,
Ere we reach our journey's end.
Yet a little while to labor,
Ere the evening shades descend:
Then we'll lay us down to slumber,
But the night will soon be o'er:
In the bright, the bright forever,
We shall slumber nevermore.

THE MEN and WOMEN of the HOUR

FRANZ KOSSUTH

Franz Kossuth, the leader of the Hungarian Independent party, is a son of the great Liberator, Louis Kossuth. Last month he had an audience with the Emperor, Francis Joseph of Austria, who gave his consent to two important measures advocated by Kossuth—the election bill and the one dealing with taxation in Hungary. The Emperor, however, refused his consent to the one dealing with changes in the Hungarian army, fearing it would reduce its efficiency.

EVANGELINE BOOTH

Miss Evangeline Booth will take the leading part in the celebration of the twenty fifth anniversary of the Salvation Army's work in America. This is, indeed, as it should be, for the name of Booth has been for more than thirty years identified with the world-wide work of uplifting the despairing and the unfortunate. It is a record of twenty-five years of struggle, crowned with the admiration and respect of fellow Christians of all denominations.

SENOR QUINTANA

Senor Quintana has just been elected President of Argentina. He is a man of strong character, and will bring years of experience to his difficult task of governing this turbulent republic. Martial law has been declared, but it is reported that President Quintana will be able to suppress any movements that would threaten the existence of the government as it now exists. Argentina is beginning to realize that insurrections on small pretexts are out of date.

SIR CASPAR CLARKE

Sir Caspar Purdon Clarke, who has been appointed director of America's greatest museum of art—the Metropolitan in New York City—comes to this country with a well-established reputation in his own field. He was for many years director of the Kensington Museum in London, which has attained its present excellence largely through his efforts as a collector and as a critic of art. Sir Caspar will take charge of the Metropolitan this Fall.

WILLIAM D. MAHON

William D. Mahon, President of the Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employes, has been in New York, in connection with the strike in the Subway. He is a believer in arbitration as the best means of settling labor troubles. The local body declining the arbitration of the officials of his Association, he formally withdrew the support of the parent organization. This practically ended the strike that threatened such inconvenience to three million people.

COUNTESS OF WARWICK

The Countess of Warwick is one of the prominent leaders of the Labor Party in England, and has recently finished a speech-making campaign that covered several counties. She takes special interest in the working girls, and established a store in London a few years ago that proved most successful. In Warwickshire, where her estates are situated, she conducts meetings for farmers, where all subjects connected with scientific farm methods are discussed.

A PAIR OF CHURCH MICE

BY CARRIE M. C. DAVIS

"AUNT MARY," said Mabel, in an impatient tone, "this is the third time this morning that you have stood looking at the church. What do you find so interesting about it?"

As Miss Wilson turned to reply, she became aware that breakfast was getting cold. "Oh, I'll come and eat now," she said, taking her seat at the table. "I was only wondering why there should be a fire in the church this morning."

"Is there one?" asked the now mollified Mabel, sipping her coffee. "Perhaps it's for prayer-meeting this evening."

"No, they would not build one so early for that; besides, there has been a fire started over there before six o'clock every morning this week. It looks suspicious, and I mean to inquire into it."

"Oh, don't go over there, auntie. It might be tramps; I've heard of such things."

"Nonsense," returned Miss Wilson sharply. "It's much more likely that that young minister goes over early to practice on the organ. It looks sly and underhanded, I think."

"How improbable," said Mabel. She felt that her aunt's theory was an absurd one, yet could think of none more reasonable, and hesitated to take up the cudgels in Mr. Deming's defense, lest Miss Wilson should think her unduly interested in the new minister, as young ladies in country towns are popularly supposed to be.

Miss Wilson's affection for the little church across the street amounted almost to a feeling of ownership. Yet with rare tact she took so small a part in its management that she had never been accused "of trying to run it," even though she was its most liberal contributor. For more than a quarter of a century her father had occupied its pulpit, and since his death all her affection was centered on the church and her niece Mabel, so that the trivial matter of a fire at an unusual time was enough to arouse her vigilance. During the day she kept a sharp lookout, but learned nothing, so she went to prayer-meeting that evening firmly resolved to ferret out the mystery.

The weekly prayer-meeting was held in the basement of the church, in a large, pleasant room, which was also used for sociables and other festivities. Besides this there was a kitchen and a furnace room; but only the large room was lighted when Mabel and her aunt arrived early for the service, and found the janitor and his wife there before them. Miss Wilson was about to ask Mr. Teeples concerning the matter which had bothered her that day, but suddenly changed her mind and said nothing.

Mr. Teeples was an old man, tall and slim, with enormous hands and feet. His wife was a fat little roly-poly of a woman, his exact opposite in temperament as well as in appearance, who seemed by her spryness of manner to express constant disapprobation of her partner's more leisurely conduct. Indeed, her disapproval was not always silent when she helped him to care for the church. It was their only means of livelihood and but for her help he could not have managed the work. On this evening she sat primly on one of the front row of chairs. For some moments after Miss Wilson's and Mabel's arrival she was silent, then turned half around with the air of one having news to communicate. It was put, however, in the form of a question.

"Have you heard whether Mr. Deming has got back yet?"

"Why, no; where has he gone?" asked Miss Wilson.

"He went to Harrison's Corners yesterday morning to preach at a funeral, and it was snowin' so hard he said he should stay all night. He ain't got back yet, I guess. The drifts is awful."

The entrance of others put an end to the conversation, and Mabel glanced at her aunt with a slightly triumphant air, as much as to say: "See how unjust your suspicions were!" But Miss Wilson's thoughts were intent upon finding a new solution to the mystery.

After a slight delay, Mr. Deming came and opened the meeting, apologizing for his tardiness by saying that he had but just got home over almost impassable roads. Miss Wilson resolutely gave her attention to the service, but as soon as the little congregation had been dismissed, she went into the kitchen under pretense of looking through the cupboard for a plate she had left there at the last sociable. Mabel knew well that no plate was missing from her aunt's orderly shelves, but she waited patiently. The mystery, having lost its unpleasant feature, interested her no longer.

Mr. Deming accompanied the two ladies across the street. As he was about to leave them at their gate, Miss Wilson, much to Mabel's surprise, invited him to come in and have a cup of tea. "I don't believe you've had any supper," she said.

"Yes, do," warmly seconded Mabel, forgetting that the gossips would accuse her of "setting her cap" for the young minister. For him to go supperless to bed at any time would be shocking, but after that long, cold ride it was not to be permitted.

"I am hungry," he said, accepting their hospitality gratefully. He gave a sigh of content a few moments later, as he watched Mabel spreading a snowy cloth on the old-fashioned round table in the cosy sitting-room. It was the first time he had been made to feel at home by one of his new congregation, and that, together with the material comforts, more than compensated for the long, cold ride through the heavy drifting snow.

"MISS WILSON ENTERED WITH TWO SUCH BULGING BASKETS, THAT THEY BOTH LAUGHED."

It was a merry company which gathered around the little table when the feast was spread. As soon as Miss Wilson discovered that Mr. Deming's grandfather had been her father's college chum in days long past, the last vestige of her aversion toward him as a new-comer vanished. Mr. Deming entertained them with stories of the theological students' pranks, and Mabel, while laughing at the others' anecdotes, urged them both to eat by pretending to a prodigious appetite of her own. When Mr. Deming at last took his departure, he assured his hostess that he had never enjoyed a meal more in his life, and inwardly he declared that he had never met a girl so charming as Mabel. A cold room at his boarding-house increased his appreciation of the home comforts he had left, and he fell asleep, dreaming of a home of his own, with Mabel as its lovely mistress.

When the last of the congregation had left the little church, Mr. Teeples leisurely proceeded to turn out all the lights except one, and then locked the door. His wife, after removing her bonnet and shawl, made a screen around the lighted lamp with hymn-books, so that its light could not be seen on the window-shades. Evidently the couple intended to remain in the church all night, for they next improvised two beds by placing the seats of the long-cushioned benches closely together, making a comfortable sleeping-place near the fire. An armful of blankets from the furnace-room completed their preparations for the night, and then this pair of veritable church mice sat down by the fire for a few moments' chat before retiring.

"I guess Miss Wilson suspects something," began the old man gloomily. "She looked around pretty sharp when she went in the little room."

"Do you suppose she does?" asked his frightened little wife. "Oh, what would they do with us if they found out?"

"Hire a new janitor," replied her husband. "It won't do to cook anything more while we're here. I kind o' think she smelled that bacon we had for breakfast."

"It's all gone, anyway, and so is most everything else."

"I've only got six cents left in money and it's more than two weeks yet before I can draw my pay. I'll try and get some wood to split to-morrow, or perhaps I can earn a little shoveling snow."

"The weather is so cold that I'm afraid you'll be laid up again with rheumatiz like you was a spell ago. I wish I could get some mending to do."

Presently they lay down without undressing, pulled the worn blankets over them, and tried to sleep. The same thought filled the mind of each: that they were in imminent danger of being discovered. Badly as they were situated now, they were at least warmly housed, but if they were compelled to leave their present quarters—and not for a moment did they doubt the just anger of the church officers if this trespassing were found out—only one resource was left them—the poorhouse.

Miss Wilson overslept on the following morning, and found breakfast on the table when she got downstairs. She sat down and commenced to eat her bacon and eggs in a thoughtful manner, for she had more than usual to occupy her mind that morning. Suddenly she paused with a bit of bacon on her fork, and holding it up as though for Mabel to inspect, exclaimed, "I see it all now!"

"See what, auntie?"

"Why, about the church, of course. I could smell something in the little room last night that didn't seem natural in a church, but I couldn't think what it was. It was bacon, and the rest is as plain as day."

"But, auntie, you don't think Mr. Deming would cook bacon in the church?"

"No, but old Mrs. Teeples might. You know they are as poor as church mice and I believe they are staying there to save fuel. Anyhow, I propose to investigate."

"Poor things," commented Mabel. "What will you do?"

"Well, I shall get my baking done first. Then I'll go over there, and if what I think is true, I shall make them go with me to the minister and he can do as he sees fit."

"Of course," she added, relenting a trifle, "if they're suffering we'll all help them."

Soon the sweet, wholesome odor of freshly baked bread mingled with the spicy scent of golden pumpkin pies cooling on the table. Insensibly Miss Wilson's wrath vanished as she viewed with pleasure the tempting results of her morning's labor.

"I wonder if they are hungry," she murmured.

Mabel, appearing in the doorway just as her aunt took two loaves of cake from the oven, exclaimed, "Mercy! Aunt Mary, what are you doing such a lot of baking for? Are we going to have company?"

The color deepened in Miss Wilson's cheeks. She looked quite guilty and embarrassed.

"Now, auntie, confess that part of this is for the Teeples."

"What if it is!" demanded her aunt somewhat sharply. "I don't uphold 'em in what they're doing, but I don't like to see any one suffer. Of course, they can't stay there, and the church folks 'll have to turn in and help 'em. I was always in favor of giving him more pay, anyhow.

"Maybe they're hungry now," she continued with a sob. "I'm going over and ask 'em to dinner. You get it started." And throwing a shawl over her head, she ran across the street.

ORIENTAL SHEPHERD

JESUS, THE GOOD SHEPHERD

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

WE can imagine the blind man saying: "I knew that Jesus was giving the Pharisees a new and unexpected rendering of the twenty-third Psalm. From the time I was a boy I had repeated that psalm, having learned it at my mother's knee, but from henceforth it will have new life and new light for me. 'The Lord is my Shepherd! I shall not want.' What can I lack, when he will lay down his life for me? The green pastures of peace he gives to me; the well of everlasting life is the still deep water to which he has led me. He has restored both my eyes and my soul. He is leading me in the way of faith and right living. I will fear no enemies, not even death, for by his rod he leads me and cares for me, and by his staff he defends me. He has upheld me and strengthened me this day in the presence of mine enemies. He has healed my blind eyes, as a shepherd anoints his bruised sheep. He has refreshed my weary soul by his loving kindness, as a shepherd bathes the brow of his weary sheep."

Illustration and Application

I. Christ the door. I am the door of the sheep. The open door means opportunity and invitation for sinful men to enter the soul's sheepfold, the heart of God. The door is the spear wound of Calvary. The Pharisees thought they had entered by heredity and learning and office and religious forms, but Jesus tells them they have not entered at all, but are climbing up the wall, like robbers, when the open door of repentance and faith at hand is the only way they can really get in. "I am the way; by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved." "I am the way, the truth, and the life." They thought Abraham and Moses were the doors, that is, Jewish birth and outward obedience to laws and ordinances. Jesus taught in this parable what Peter afterwards preached at Pentecost: "There is none other Name given under heaven among men whereby we may be saved." "Good blood" is something to be thankful for, but only the blood of Christ can overmatch the sinful tendencies of human nature. Moses was great, but only "Moses and the Lamb" can make sinful man a true child of God.

One only Name is given,
One only Way is known,
'Tis Jesus Christ, the first and last,
He saves, and he alone.

A very pertinent illustration, worth repeating whenever Christ is presented as the door to salvation, is the story of some clerks in an office building in New York, who stayed late one night, and when they had walked down many flights, the elevator hour having passed, found the outside door closed in their faces. They supposed it locked, and so made but a slight effort to open it, and shouted to passers-by to telephone the janitor far away. While they waited for hours, crowds came and went sympathizing with the nervous prisoners, who were troubled not only by missing dinners and other engagements, but because their families would be worried by their delay. At last word came from the janitor that the door was not locked at all. One determined effort would have opened the unlocked door hours before and saved the long and needless waiting. How true the picture of many who intend to be Christians sometime, but think they cannot now. The door seems to be locked to them by some obstacle in themselves or in their environment. But the door to salvation is unlocked, and we have only to make a determined effort of our own to pass through the door, out of darkness and hunger and anxiety, into light and joy and liberty.

I am the door, come in, come in,
And leave behind thy load of sin.

II. Jesus, the Good Shepherd. The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. An open door to a safe fold is Christ's beautiful way to express "welcome" to the sinner, but a far more perfect picture of Christ's part in the soul's salvation is the living, loving Shepherd who goes out at the cost of his own life to bring in the one wandering sheep. God seeking men! Heathen religions picture only seekers after God. Here we see God seeking, not alone the spiritual (John 4: 23) but the sinful. A traveler writes:

"On the Aleutsch glacier I saw a strange and beautiful sight—the parable of the 'ninety and nine' repeated to the letter. One day we were making our way with ice-ax and alpenstock down the glacier, when we observed a flock of sheep following their shepherd over the intricate windings between the crevasses, and so passing from the pastures on one side of the glacier to the pastures on the other. The flock numbered two hundred all told.

"But on the way one sheep got lost. One of the shepherds, in his German patois, appealed to us whether we had seen it. Fortunately one of the party had a field-glass. With its aid we discovered the sheep up amid a tangle of brushwood on the rocky mountain side. It was beautiful to see how the shepherd, without a word, left his hundred and ninety-nine sheep out in the glacier waste, knowing they would stand there still and perfectly safe, and went clambering back after the lost sheep until he found it; and he actually put it on his shoulders, and returned 'rejoicing.' Here was the Lord's parable enacted before our eyes, though the shepherd was all unconscious of it. And it brought our Lord's teaching home to us with a vividness which none can realize but those who saw the incident."

It was indeed a glacier waste of Pharisaic frost in which Christ sought out his wandering sheep, with bleeding feet and breaking heart, yet rejoicing whenever a wanderer was willing to be borne upon his strong shoulders to the safe fold of his true followers.

Prof. James Orr, D.D., of Glasgow, lecturing on the return of many learned men, of late, from scepticism to faith, cites the case of George J. Romanes, who, from being a believer in youth, wandered away, through the influence of a "little learning," to absolute atheism. But the Good Shepherd, who brings back the lowly wanderers, has brought back this learned wanderer also and many more. As he pursued his studies, more learning compelled him to recognize that Nature must be the product of Mind. For awhile longer he said the Author of Nature was intelligent but not benevolent, for the struggle of life seemed to him merciless. But yet further study showed him that the Author of Nature was manifestly seeking not pleasure but perfection, and using pain as an effective instrument, and so gradually he was brought back from the cold heights of atheism to the sunny valleys of a full faith in Christ, in which he died. Not alone material science was providentially used to restore him, but he was greatly influenced by the fact that many of the greatest scientists, no less learned than himself, were men of simple faith. Thus they helped God bring him back.

The following modern but evangelical analysis of conversion, condensed from the Congregationalist, may help to bring other scholarly sceptics back to the safe fold of faith in a Christ: "Select some person in whose nature Christian forces have been operating for ten or twenty years. Perhaps a schoolmate of yours whom you have not seen for a long time, suddenly appears. He is the same fellow with whom you used to play ball, but there is a strength and dignity about him, a kindliness of spirit which were not his then. Now he has a grip on himself, he holds his tongue in leash. The secret of it all is that he has been a pupil in the school of Christ. This transformation of the world and of individuals is due first to the fact that Christ has come to be the ideal for human life. He is in the forefront of humanity's advance. The fact that He stands there exerts a tremendous influence.

"Influential as is the ideal of character for which Jesus stands, he does even more for those who come into personal relations with him. When we begin to love, obey and serve this personal Christ, certain radical changes go into effect as important as a new time-table on a railway. We stay away from some of the places which we used to frequent. Our vocabulary is purified and enlarged. We carry ourselves quietly and patiently when we used to get hot and indignant. We avoid courses of action which once seemed entirely admissible. We take a stand in reference to great principles which before looked in vain to us for championship. Not all at once, to be sure, do we put on the virtues and the graces of the Spirit, but our faces are set that way, and there can be but one result if we keep on doing things which Jesus bids.

"Much of this transformation results from our own initiative, but over and above what we accomplish through persistent, strenuous effort, our characters take on a finer finish and fairer proportion, because of what Christ does himself. The Bible is continually speaking of this transforming influence which proceeds from above. The old-fashioned term for it is the grace of God. Whatever one calls it, it stands for the coming into our lives through the mediation of Jesus Christ, of the purity, the compassionate love and the transforming power of the unseen God. Christ does much for us when he gets us at work for our own salvation. He does yet more when he brings us into vital relations with himself and with his father."

III. Safe in the Fold. From Mr. D. L. Moody's Bible the writer copied a seven-walled fold of safety, with Mr. Moody's own name in the centre of the seven circles. Under it were the words: "D. L. Moody, well guarded by that Man whom his soul loveth." In the seven red circles were written: "Embraced by him," "Hedged about by him," "Compassed about with songs by him," "Compassed with mercy through him," "Encamped round about by his angels," "Surrounded by the Lord himself," "Surrounded by a wall of fire." Partly above and partly below the circles was written, from the chapter of our present lesson, John 10:27: "My sheep shall never perish; neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand."

Some writer has thus developed the likeness of Christians to sheep: "Sheep are simple, harmless, useful animals. They do not rely upon their own ability to protect themselves, either by flight or fight, as do other animals; but they trust in and follow their shepherd. Their ears are quick to discern the voice of their shepherd, and they willingly follow him. So Christians who are, in truth, the Lord's sheep, are characterized by simplicity, harmlessness, and lives of usefulness. They are gentle, slow to resent an insult, humble, quiet, hopeful, confiding. Having placed their confidence in their Shepherd, they do not fret or worry. His words, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee,' 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world,' are their stronghold and hiding-place. They do not think of their own ability to save themselves, nor boast of their own holiness; they just go on, humbly, gladly following their Shepherd in the path of duty and confiding love."

There is another side to Christian character that this illustration does not cover, for Christians are called to be "as bold as a lion." Like sheep in trustfulness, they are also to be as lions in Christian courage. Really perfect trust is the secret of courage. No one can really be afraid who actually believes he is ever under the eye of the Good Shepherd. His thought will not be of fears, but of following the Shepherd.

O! for a finely tuned ear,
The Shepherd's voice to hear and know
Both when it speaks distinct and clear,
And when it whispers soft and low.

O! for an ear to list its call,
When sounds it, in the stormy hour;
And when its accents gently fall,
Like dew upon the fainting flower.

Then grant me, Lord, the listening ear,
And grant the Heaven-directed eye,—
The faith, that waits thy voice to hear,—
The love, that keeps me ever nigh.

The Largest Kitchen

WHEN you are busy in your tidy little kitchen, with everything convenient, close by your hand, only a few steps to take from table to range, and from range to pantry, you feel that the work is not so hard, and that you are queen of your own domain. The ordinary kitchen is, or ought to be, a sunny, cheerful place, for it is the very heart's core of the home. If things go right in the kitchen, and the meals are nicely prepared and well-served, the health and temper of the family will not sink much below par. The most beautiful kitchen which I have ever seen was in a palatial home in Washington, where everything was tiled, and all the tables and utensils that could possibly be of glass were made of that material. A corps of white-capped, white-jacketed Chinese cooks kept this luxurious kitchen in apple-pie order. I have seen large kitchens in some of our hotels, and have marveled at their conveniences, and at the complete arrangements that were made for feeding and serving the hundreds of guests who pass in and out of a modern hotel. It takes a brain of no common order to carry on the operations of one of these big caravansaries with every attachment belonging thereto.

We in our modest homes, know very little about housekeeping in so immense a style. For instance, the picture accompanying this bit of talk, is a general view of the biggest kitchen in the world. It is situated in the basement of the new Hotel Astor, in New York City. The Astor is one of a group of hotels recently erected. It was opened to the public in September, 1904, and its cost was nearly seven million dollars. From basement to roof, every part of the building is finished with the most elegant care, and every possible luxury has been lavished in the arrangements of its rooms. The Astor claims to be absolutely fireproof, its every stairway being inclosed with fireproof materials and doors, and every room being supplied with automatic fire detectors. The detector is an electrical device which goes off of its own accord, when the temperature around it rises to 130 degrees, sounding an alarm in the hotel office, in the main lobby. The person hearing the alarm can at once, by the turning of a lever, cut off the room which is on fire from every other part of the building.

The kitchen of the Astor Hotel is situated in the basement, is 231 feet long, with an average width of 150 feet. It is entirely sanitary, so far as cleanliness is concerned, the walls being of white tiling, and no possibility being left for any lurking germs to propagate themselves in cracks and chinks; the smooth white surface repels all unwholesome bacteria. There is a stretch of 100 feet of ranges, besides a great oven and a "jack" or spit. Orders come from the several dining-rooms through pneumatic tubes, and automatic conveyers take the dishes up and down. In the ordinary house, the washing of dishes three times a day, by the slow, old-fashioned process, is no light task. One sometimes wonders how the dishes in hotels are ever washed. In the Astor there is a mechanical device, which swiftly, noiselessly and safely washes, sterilizes, and dries the dishes.

Underneath the basement proper, is another, in which are the boilers, electrical machinery, ice-plant, and other needful appliances and apparatus, as well as a crematory, which is a novelty in hotel equipment. Here are burned all empty boxes, papers and garbage. The American Inventor says that, "The ice machinery of the Astor has a capacity of 120 tons per day. Brine pipes circulate throughout the building, and instead of the old-time ice-water pitchers, the guests receive frozen, triply distilled water in carafes. In the engine room, also in the sub-basement, are four large dynamos and a big storage battery. From this plant is derived all the electric power for operating the elevators, and the 14,000 electric lights in the building, to connect which, and for other purposes, took over thirty miles of electric wires."

This large hotel covers an entire block on Broadway, between Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Streets. The building covers thirty-five thousand square feet, and contains five-hundred bedrooms, and three hundred bathrooms.

While we do not aspire or expect to possess so many modern conveniences in our little homes, as are the portion of these great hotels, we may console ourselves by the thought that our expenses are a drop in the bucket as compared with theirs. Only a very large income can bear the strain that is made by the daily expenses in one of these enormous hotels. On the other hand, every possible care is eliminated from the individual who has a good-sized pocket-book, and who can afford to stop either a few days or indefinitety in one of these splendid inns.

The servant question may bother the proprietor, but it does not intrude upon his guests. In the dining-room, as a rule, the waiting is prompt, courteous and efficient, the food is delicious and varied, and the beds are dreams of ease, where anyone with a good conscience should sleep well.

An interesting study must be the catering and marketing for a great hotel. The products of many thousand farms go daily to the city, and from the great markets, fruit, vegetables, meat and poultry of the finest are purchased for the table. Everything is there, not only in season, but very much ahead of the season, and it is a pleasant sight to glance over one of the restaurants when people are at breakfast or dinner, observing how far in advance of ancient Rome, or Greece, or even of modern Europe, are our American hotels.

THE GREATEST KITCHEN IN THE WORLD

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—A. G. H. The attendance of Mr. and Mrs. A. upon the wedding reception of Mr. and Mrs. B., in the circumstances, constituted a call, which Mr. and Mrs. B. are now at liberty to return.

—A Grateful Reader. It is very much better that husband and wife should be in perfect accord on the greatest subject of all, and that both should be Christians. In no circumstances should a girl marry a man who drinks. She is always certain, if she does so, to face a terrible future.

Plenty of Time

NO complaint is oftener heard than the familiar one that there is no time. Many people live in a constant rush. It seems impossible for them ever to have any repose. To their own consciousness they are continually hurried and troubled, and yet they have all the time there is. Those who manage well, who economize time as they would any other precious thing, contrive in the end to get through what they undertake. There is a great deal in being methodical; there is a great deal in beginning early in the morning. The half-hour lost in the morning is seldom regained in the course of the day. Much time is wasted in talking about what we are going to do. While we are planning, and expatiating, and getting ready, somebody else has a thing done. If one systematizes the week's work, in all probability a good deal more will be accomplished by Saturday night than if things are left to haphazard management. Do it now, is a good motto for the desk, the kitchen, the office, the shop. "What thou doest, do quickly." While we loiter and linger the moments pass that might have been harnessed to our chariot of victory; but instead only emphasize the disgrace of our defeat. Begin, keep on, and finish—are words to conjure with. William Cowper, the poet, writing in 1783 to a friend, has an entertaining word to say about time.

"I have wondered in former days at the patience of the antediluvian world; that they could endure a life almost millenary, with so little variety as seems to have fallen to their share. It is probable that they had much fewer employments than we. Their affairs lay in a narrower compass; their libraries were indifferently furnished; philosophical researches were carried on with much less industry and acuteness of penetration, and fiddles, perhaps, were not even invented. How could seven or eight hundred years of life be supportable? I will suppose myself born a thousand years before Noah was born or thought of. I rise with the sun; I worship; I prepare my breakfast; I swallow a bucket of goat's milk, and a dozen good-sized cakes. I fasten a new string to my bow. The morning is thus spent in preparing for the chase, and it is become necessary that I should dine. I dig up my roots; I wash them; I boil them; I find them not done enough; I boil them again. Meantime the fire goes out and must be kindled again. All this is very amusing. I hunt; I bring home the prey; with the skin of it I mend an old coat, or I make a new one. By this time the day is far spent; I feel myself fatigued, and retire to rest. Thus, what with tilling the ground and eating the fruit of it, hunting, and walking, and running, and mending old clothes, and sleeping, and rising again, I can suppose an inhabitant of the primeval world so much occupied, as to sigh over the shortness of life, and to find at the end of many centuries, that they had all slipt through his fingers, and were passed away like a shadow."

What would the poet have thought had he lived now, when applied science has so changed every condition that we speak through tubes to friends at a distance; hear concerts and sermons seated in our own rooms; light a dark room by a touch, and flash over the roads in automobiles? Yet still we have no time. It is the world-old plaint.

In a short time she came back with Mr. and Mrs. Teeples, and all sat down to dinner. The guests seemed to enjoy the abundant food, but were ill at ease; and Miss Wilson, though she tried to make the conversation cheerful, was somewhat absent-minded. As soon as the meal was finished, Mr. Teeples returned to open the church for the missionary meeting; and his wife, casting an appealing glance at Miss Wilson, "guessed she would go with him." Miss Wilson nodded assent, and as soon as the door closed on the retreating couple, began her story.

"Just as I got to the little door, he came out to empty some ashes, so I walked right in after him. You never saw any one so frightened in your life as they were. Their dinner was ready, and all they had, Mabel, was crackers and dried herring." The good woman's voice broke, and she paused to wipe her eyes. " 'Good morning,' said I, as natural as I could, 'I've come over to ask you to dinner with me.' Then they broke down and told me all about it. You see, he gets his pay monthly, and mighty small it is, too. Last fall she was sick, and they got in debt at Deacon Ellis' store. The deacon, who is our respected treasurer, kept back his pay last month, and told him, if he said anything about it he would use his influence to have another janitor hired. When this last cold spell came on, they got out of fuel, and the old man went to the deacon to see if he wouldn't give him two weeks' pay; but the deacon was mad and refused. Just as they were at their wit's end to know what to do, he was told to keep a fire in the basement of the church, and that solved the problem. So the fire was all right, and if I hadn't smelled the bacon, no one would have found out about their poverty or the deacon's meanness.

"At first, they only stayed in the church daytimes; but they suffered so from the cold at night, that they decided to live in the basement until the next month's wages was due, and they could get some fuel. He has gone in and out of the church openly, but she just stayed right there and kept quiet, and when there was a meeting of any kind, she put on her bonnet an I shawl, and no one noticed. Well, now, we must decide what to do. I think we had better go to Mr. Deming, and place the matter in his hands."

As if in answer to her thought, there came a peal of the old-fashioned knocker, and the minister appeared when the door was opened. If he had supposed that Miss Wilson would be at the missionary meeting, he showed no sign of disappointment at not finding Mabel alone, but listened to the elder lady's story with the utmost attention. He left the house, promising to act at once in the old people's behalf, and return as soon as possible, with a report of what had been done.

In the meantime, Miss Wilson busied herself getting tea ready, and as it was after five when Mr. Deming returned, the three again sat down at the table together.

"Directly after leaving here," said the minister, "I called upon Brother Perry and told him the pitiful story. We went to see Deacon Ellis, who had not fully realized their poverty, for he is not entirely hardhearted, though a trifle 'near.' He was rather ashamed of what he had done, and as a proof of his contrition sent them a generous donation of groceries. Mr. Perry gave them some money for their present needs, and wood has been sent them, so they are now comfortably ensconced in their own home. To-morrow we shall have a meeting of the church officers, when Mr. Teeples' wages will surely be increased."

Miss Wilson had listened eagerly to this satisfactory report.

"And now," she said, "they're home again, but I don't suppose they've a mite in the house that's cooked and ready to eat. You two finish your supper, while I pack a basket with some of the things we've baked to-day," and she disappeared into the pantry.

"This is twice you have sat opposite me at supper," said Mr. Deming, in a low tone to Mabel. "I find it very pleasant."

Mabel blushed. "You must come often," she replied, "I'm sure auntie enjoys having you."

"And how about you?" he began, but Mabel was saved a reply, for just then Miss Wilson re-entered the room with two such bulging baskets, that they both laughed.

"Well," she said, as though in defense, "If there's anything I do like it's seeing people eat. I was saying to Mabel to-day how I enjoyed having you come, and she said she hoped you'd come often, didn't you, Mabel?"

And to Mr. Deming's great satisfaction, Mabel was obliged to say, "Yes."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

A Young Christian wishes to acknowledge to the world that God has answered many prayers for her.

E. B., New Jersey. "I would add my testimony to so many others, that the Lord is a loving Father, and when I was in trouble he answered my humble prayers and sent relief."

M. A. H., Kansas. "More things are accomplished through prayer than the world dreams of. I earnestly asked God to help and guide us—he has answered."

Mrs. S. I. Y., Penn Yan. "God has answered many prayers for me in an unmistakable way. I am praying him to remove a burden, and I know he will answer in his own good time and way."

Mrs. A. E. D., Ohio. "That the faith of some one else may be strengthened, I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers. Seven months ago a little daughter was born unto us, but those who saw her said she would not live. But, praise his great and holy name, my prayer was answered and she is with us, a bright little star in our home."

An Old Subscriber, Missouri. "It gives me pleasure to add my testimony to many answered prayers. How can we ever doubt the promises of him who died for us."

Arnold A. M., Long Island. "I want to add my name as one of those who have had their prayers answered."

M. P. H., Texas. "I promised God that if he would spare the lives of my two boys, that I would acknowledge it. He heard my prayers, and now I want to implore the prayers of your readers that their souls may be saved."

Mrs. M. W., Virginia. "I have been greatly helped by reading 'Answered Prayers,' and I wish to add my testimony that God does hear and answer the fervent petitions of his believing children."

A Constant Reader, Canada. "The 'Answered Prayers' have done much to strengthen my faith. I know that my heavenly Father both hears and answers prayer. I was unable to use my eyes to read his Word. I prayed that they might be restored, and God mercifully heard my prayer. I can testify to his answering prayers many times."

Mrs. L. M. B., Missouri. "I know God answers prayers, as he has just answered one for me. Some times before the answer came, my faith would be almost gone. I write this, hoping it may help some one, as the 'Answered Prayers' have helped me."

R. E., Jacksonville, Ill. "I am a little boy six years old, and I have had trouble for a long time. My grandma told me if I would take my trouble to the Lord in prayer, like she always did when in trouble, that the Lord would help me. I have been praying every day for over a year. The Lord has answered my prayers, and I know now I can trust him, and can go to him in time of trouble. I cannot write a letter to you myself, but I got my Aunt to write for me."

F. O. F., Tenn. "I write to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers many times. May I never doubt him."

Reader, Lewisburg, Tenn. "I acknowledge God's loving kindness and tender mercy to me. God certainly answers prayers."

M. M. A., Pontiac, Ills. "My heart is full of praise and thanksgiving to God for the blessing of an answered prayer, to spare the life of a beloved one."

Mary J., Canada. "'Man's extremity is God's opportunity.' I was upheld by the right hand of his righteousness. I am in trouble still, and would ask all who pray in this column to unite in prayer for me, that I may be guided in the right way, for 'the effectual, fervent prayer of the righteous man availeth much.' Organize the World for Peace

By LUCIA AMES MEAD

THE most important question that confronts the thinking world to-day is the end of international duelling, and the end of that armed peace which is only one degree less ruinous than war itself. It is almost safe to say that not one in ten has a glimmering of any practical way of bringing an end to international duelling before the millennium.

The world will never have peace until it is organized, and it can never be safely organized until the different countries have representative government. An organization of despots might indeed have brought peace, but an ignoble peace, a peace of injustice. At the time when Emanuel Kant declared this truth, no nation in the world had any representative government to speak of. The great political work of the nineteenth century was the establishment of representative government in every country in Christendom but Russia, and even she must soon yield her autocracy. In 1898, when the Czar summoned the twenty-six nations to begin world organization, the psychological moment had arrived for a great, new, world-enterprise. There are still millions of educated men as ignorant of the significance of this movement, and as behind the times, as were old fogies in 1840, who had no vision of the revolution that steam and electricity were to effect in the world's commerce. To-day the world is alert to every material change to be wrought by mechanics, and expects inventions; but it is stupidly blind to the relief from the increasing colossal burdens of armed peace to be wrought by new facilities for organization.

The principles involved are nothing new; they must simply have a wider application. We have tried them here in the United States since 1789, and they have kept the peace between forty-five States. Differences between States that, without the provision of the Supreme Court might have led to war, have been so quietly sent to the arbitrament of judges that few citizens know aught of it. While international courts and Congress may not prevent civil war, they will prevent war between nations, unless half the world were ever to war against the other half—an inconceivable thing among nations, and a less and less likely event within a nation. The world's states have to-day their own supreme court of nations, and that court has strengthened in power and prestige every month since President Roosevelt and President Diaz sent it its first case.

Said a prominent lawyer to Dr. Hale, at Mohonk, in 1897, "I want to see a Permanent International Tribunal just as much as you do, but no man will ever live long enough to see it." In less than five years from this doleful prognostication, one hundred eminent representatives from twenty-six nations had spent three months at the Hague; had signed three conventions and had them ratified; the seventy odd judges had been appointed, a mansion bought and furnished, a secretary established, and the first case settled. The first great step in world organization had been taken, making epoch in human history. Since then, twelve other nations have appeared before the Court, and under the provision of one of the Conventions, the recent attack by Russians upon a British fishing fleet has been calmly investigated, and passed upon judicially. In spite of the refusal of our Senate to ratify as submitted, the nine arbitration treaties which Secretary Hay had signed, the whole American people, and even most of the Senators, stand for arbitration.

Two definite lines of practical work in world-organization should claim the attention of the educated world for the next few years. One, the strengthening of the Hague Court; the other, the establishment of a regular World Congress. This at first would be only advisory, but when its conclusions were ratified by the nations, little by little, a new body of international law would be established. Had such a Congress been in session five years ago, when the Manchurian war cloud was no bigger than a man's hand, the rights of neutrals would doubtless have been one of the questions considered, and the hideous futile contest in the Far East would probably have been averted. Japan would have been protected, Manchuria's independence maintained, and Russia perhaps, given a sea outlet in the near East, which her future prosperity demands. Were a Congress of the world's great diplomats and jurists to sit regularly every three or four years for several months in some capital like Geneva, or Brussels, to calmly discuss the mooted questions of international relations and the rights of neutrals, and to extend neutrality over weaker nations whom the cupidity of the great Powers would absorb, order and reason might soon supplant the anarchical international relations which now endanger investment, give pretext for menacing navies, and fill the future with dread.

The World Congress is a possibility within the next five years. The Massachusetts Legislature has unanimously petitioned Congress to take the initial steps toward calling a conference to arrange it. Every one who has risen to the conception of the new internationalism should work incessantly for this end which, more than all the charities of the world combined, would lessen human misery and waste.

Since Washington's day, though our population has increased only twenty times, the sum which he then thought adequate for a "respectable defensive posture" has been multiplied two hundredfold! As a nation we are wavering in the balance between retrograde and progressive measures, that shall determine the conditions under which hundreds of millions in the future are to suffer or to prosper. The Religious Education Association, whose three great annual meetings have now brought it to the verge of action on this matter, must be importuned to take a further step, and to rise to the greatest opportunity for practical, far-reaching accomplishment in bringing Christ's kingdom on earth, that the centuries ever have presented.

To Help the World's Peace

The American Peace Society issues the following: "An appeal was made on January 4 to the civilized world, to raise the price of a battleship ($7,000,000), for the establishment of a $500,000 plant for peace propaganda in fourteen of the world's great capitals. This was an amplification of the appeal of the Propaganda Committee of the International Peace Congress last autumn. To stimulate study and thought on this subject, we now offer a prize of $75 to any one who, by May 1st, will present the best practical detailed suggestions both as to the best ways of rousing the religious organizations of every denomination of this country to a study of peace through world organization, and to the best ways of raising $500,000 for a centre of peace propaganda in this country. Suggestions must be sent to the American Peace Society, 31 Beacon Street, Boston."

GENTLEMEN: "The Strauss Kindergarten Lotto game is, in my estimation, the best child's game that I have ever seen. It has afforded me a great deal of pleasure to observe the little ones playing it. It certainly deserves to become popular, as it interests and pleases the children without tiring them; in fact, they cannot play it enough. For children's parties, the Kindergarten Lotto game will surely prove a great success

"THE COMMON LOT"*

IN Robert Herrick's latest novel, The Common Lot, the real value lies, primarily, in the lesson in honest business methods, and secondly, that the essential needs of real living are comparatively few. They are few in contrast to the unlimited artificial needs that the expenditure of great wealth creates; wealth greedily acquired and selfishly applied. The nature of the subject makes unavailable many of the finer accessories that constitute the charm of a book. The author makes his points with the plainest and even coarsest materials. He deals with cold, hard facts; many of them unpleasant facts. He threads his way through the needs and interests of the common classes; and through a limited class of rich, who are also common in a less creditable sense. The story deals with the career of a young architect, who himself says of this career, that he passes "from shirt-sleeves to shirt-sleeves," in three acts. The book holds the reader's interest; and its purpose will appeal effectively to many minds.

The Small Garden Plot †

THE impetus that gardening has lately received in this country has resulted in the greatest improvement in towns and villages. But what makes more for general and most-to-be-desired improvement and beauty is not the half dozen fine places in a town, but the many streets lined with pretty, unpretentious houses, each with neat lawn and flower borders, a few shrubs, two or three good trees, and having in the rear a small vegetable garden, all cared for by the owner, with perhaps a man for a day now and then.

Where the place is too small for a complete vegetable garden, a plot of ground twenty feet by thirty, if well fertilized and well cared for, will yield enough tomatoes, cauliflower, egg-plants, peppers, lettuce and parsley for a family of eight persons. On this plot there is room for four dozen cauliflowers, four dozen egg-plants, two dozen pepper plants, three dozen tomato plants, three crops of lettuce, and sufficient parsley.

But little time is required for the care of so small a plot, if it be regularly attended to. The plants can be raised from seed sown the first of March in boxes in sunny windows, or they may be bought about the 18th or 20th of May, which is the time to set them out. Two of the seedsman's packets of each variety of seed (costing but five cents each, except the cauliflower, which is ten cents), will raise more than sufficient plants.

A home is always more a home when the outside is cultivated and made beautiful. Go out into the country, O ye flat-dwellers of the city, and make a home! Have a few rods, if no more, of your own ground about you, and till it and tend it. The flowers you raise will be sweeter and more beautiful to you than any displayed in florists' windows, and no vegetables that can be bought will compare in flavor with those you raise yourself. The demand for good fruit has never been met with a sufficient supply, and there is always a ready market for any fine fruit raised beyond the requirements of home consumption.

Fruits should never be grown on low, wet ground, where water stands in spring or fall; in fact, they would quickly die in such a situation. The same soil and location that make a successful garden will also grow fruits successfully. Fruit trees will do better the first year on land that has been cultivated the previous season; but when they are to be planted in sod, the ground should first be ploughed deeply, all stones removed, and then well fertilized.

It is difficult for beginners in the gentle art of gardening to realize how much time and patience are required to make success. It is equally difficult at first for them to understand, that flowers to bloom in late summer and early autumn must be planted, if not the year before, certainly in very early spring, and that the spring garden must be prepared in the fall. During April and May, every hour of every day is filled with work, for the success of the garden in summer and autumn depends upon what has been done in these early months.

The Common Lot, by Robert Herrick. Price $1.50. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York and London.

†From Another Hardy Garden Book. The many readers of Helen Rutherfurd Ely's A Woman's Hardy Garden, will welcome her second volume, which has just been published by the Macmillan Company. It is suited to the needs of the person with a small plot of ground, though the owners of more pretentious estates will find much informationon the care of plants and shrubs. The vegetable garden is first considered, then fruit-trees, perennials and other flowers, and finally autumn and spring work in the garden.

In The Garden

Buckbee's Seed and Plant Guide for 1905, starts off with "The World Beating Red Onion," which is said to be an enormous yielder, matures early, is the best flavored—a splendid keeper—handsome color, and a wonderful shipper. Buckbee's Great Cardinal Onion (for that is the name of the vegetable) originated on the Rockford Seed Farms, and seed can be secured only by ordering direct. Buckbee especially recommends the Vigerosa, a magnificent new pea, ready to pick from 65 to 70 days from date of planting. H. W. Buckbee, Rockford, Ill.

Are you a lover of Nasturtiums? If so send for D. M. Ferry & Co.'s 1905 Seed Annual, on the cover of which are 15 varieties of this beautiful flower, large and most gorgeous in coloring, from a delicate shell-like pink to the richest cardinal, from the palest straw color to the most riotous yellow shading to brown. This is but one of the many beautiful things contained in Ferry & Co.'s collection of flowers and vegetables. The book, among other good things, tells how to build and manage hot-beds and cold frames. D. M. Ferry & Co., Seedsmen, Detroit, Mich.

Wm. Elliott & Sons, Seeds. That's what the cover modestly announces, in conjunction with a colored picture of the old mill, at a time when apple trees are in bloom. From the first page, where a bunch of "Clove Pinks" greets the reader, to the last, where Fertilizers and Insecticides are themes well treated, there is a great variety of subjects which cannot fail to interest all who grow flowers or vegetables. Wm. Elliott & Sons, 54-56 Dey Street, New York.

The Storrs & Harrison Co. offer this choice collection of choice vegetable seeds, seven packets in all, for 30c. postpaid, Golden Self-blanching Celery, Dwarf Champion Peas, Premo Corn, Emerald Cucumber, Rockyford Musk Melon, Sparks' Earliano Tomato, Cincinnati Market Radish. There is also a superb collection of hybrid roses, and many other beautiful subjects of flora's kingdom. The Storrs & Harrison Co., Painesville, O.

The Iowa Seed Co. are sending out their thirty-fifth annual catalogue. The "McKinley Day Collection" of five carnations leads with most luscious looking fruits and vegetables a close second. Iowa Seed Co., Seedsmen to the American People, Desmoines, Iowa.

The John A. Salzer Seed Co. invite us to see inside cover, an invitation which we decline to accept until we have sufficiently admired the dainty little girl on the outside, as, with waterpot in one hand and trowel in the other, she busies herself among the flowers with which she is surrounded. There is a radiant collection of hardy Phlox, an early variety of Verbenas, a package of the latter seeds being sent free with each 40c. order. From the general appearance of the vegetables pictured in this catalogue, Mr. Salzer must have earned the title of "The Farmer's Friend." John A. Salzer Seed Co., La Crosse, Wis.

The World's Fair Judges, at St. Louis Fair last summer, gave it as their opinion that the "Louisiana is the finest orchid-flowering canna in existence." The intensity of color and beauty of this flower is hard to describe. Imagine a plant seven feet high, with glossy green foliage, each leaf edged with a narrow purple band. Its crowning beauty, the blooms, are like orchids, of a most brilliant scarlet, with sometimes as many as forty blossoms on a single plant. This is but one of the many flowers, vines and shrubs catalogued by the Conard & Jones Co., West Grove, Pa.

Elbridge E. Wheeler, Seedsman, sends out a magnificent collection of Roses and Sweet Peas, the latter containing twenty-five distinct varieties. Another feature is the prize collection of new giant-flowering Nasturtiums; seven large packages of seed for 25c. Elbridge E. Wheeler, Seedsman, Bridgeport, Conn.

Stark Bros.' Nurseries & Orchard Co, are sending out a unique pamphlet. The first page is given up to half-tone portraits of three generations of "Stark Nursery Men," from the founder, Judge James Stark, to the youngest brother of the present generation. Illustrations follow of the homes of the brothers, scenes from their broad fields and nurseries, while many pages are devoted to magnificently colored plates, representing the fruits grown in the Stark orchards and fields, Apples in every shade of green, gold and red, and Peaches in luscious variety with the bloom on their ripened cheeks. Stark Bros.' Nurseries & Orchards Co., Louisiana, Mo.

IT'S FOOD

That Restores and Makes Health Possible.

There are stomach specialists as well as eye and ear and other specialists.

One of these told a young lady of New Brunswick, N. J., to quit medicines and eat Grape-Nuts. She says:

"For about 12 months I suffered severely with gastritis. I was unable to retain much of anything on my stomach, and consequently was compelled to give up my occupation. I took quantities of medicine, and had an idea I was dieting, but I continued to suffer, and soon lost 15 pounds in weight. I was depressed in spirits and lost interest in everything generally. My mind was so affected that it was impossible to become interested in even the lightest reading matter.

"After suffering for months I decided to go to a stomach specialist. He put me on Grape-Nuts and my health began to improve immediately. It was the key-note of a new life. I found that I had been eating too much starchy food which I did not digest, and that the cereals which I had tried had been too heavy. I soon proved that it is not the quantity of food that one eats, but the quality.

"In a few weeks I was able to go back to my old business of doing clerical work. I have continued to eat Grape-Nuts for both the morning and evening meal. I wake in the morning with a clear mind and feel rested. I regained my lost weight in a short time. I am well and happy again and owe it to Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

EDUCATING POOR WHITE BOYS

NEAR the town of Rome, Ga., there is a school that was started by Miss Martha Berry, for the education of poor white boys. It was started three years ago, in a little log cabin on the Berry home place, and has grown to be an important factor in the work now being carried on in that State for the young men that have had hitherto no opportunity for instruction. The story of its growth is well told by Miss Berry herself.

"One Sunday afternoon," she writes, "I was spending an hour in the little cabin which I used as a den, when I saw several little barefooted children playing under the trees, and I invited them in. I began to tell them Bible stories, and their interest so touched me, that I asked them to come the next Sunday and bring their brothers and sisters. They came, not only bringing their brothers and sisters, but their fathers and mothers, some of the latter with babies in their arms. We had an old melodeon as an accompaniment to our singing. The instrument was so dilapidated that it had to be held by several of the children while I played. My congregation grew, and soon soap-boxes, skins, shuck-mats, and door-sills were utilized as seats. With minds fresh and eager to learn, these boys and girls roused a keen interest in my heart, and I began to visit them in their homes. My eyes went out to them, when I saw how narrow were the lives they led.

"These people are poor, and have not the means with which to educate their children or to train them in any useful line of labor. I began to realize the possibilities lying dormant in these loving, intelligent children, and determined to found a school that would teach them to help themselves. I felt that, with opportunity, they might develop into useful men and women. To do this, they should be taught to cook, to farm, to build houses and to save money.

"From the little cabin school we moved half a mile down the road. Here, on land given me by my father, we built a one-room frame house, which cost one hundred dollars, the men and boys doing most of the work. With the aid of my sister, we conducted a day school, a sewing-school on Saturdays, and organized a debating society for the boys. The attendance increased so rapidly that it became necessary to enlarge the building on each side, and to build another large room at the back.

"After three years of this work it became apparent that the day school, Sunday School, and sewing school were not sufficient to meet the needs of the people.

"In 1902 I deeded the entire place of 100 acres given me by my father, erected a two-story building, and opened an industrial school for boys of the surrounding districts.

"One of my friends, Miss Brewster, volunteered to give her services to the school. We required each boy to pay five dollars per month for board and tuition, or its equivalent in work and farm produce. We soon had twenty-five boys in this building. They scrubbed, cooked, farmed, and did carpenter's work. We gave the boys a chance — a fighting chance, that is all, for the school is so poor that it is only with the utmost economy that we can retain routine and system.

"The school is non-sectarian, but distinctly Christian in character. The students are taught to love the Bible, to study its truths, and apply them to their own lives. Religious services are held night and morning, in which the students are required to take part. This school has no endowment fund, and is supported by voluntary contributions. Parents of the boys bring donations of farm produce, which are a great help. I feel sure of the practical results of the undertaking. We have had to turn away this year two hundred boys, for lack of room."

TIBET'S STRANGE LANGUAGE

MR. LANDON (in his new book on Tibet), does not attempt to give a full account of either the written or spoken language of Tibet. With reference to the former, however, he points out the difficulty of spelling. For example, the province of "U" is spelled "Dbus," and De (rice) is spelled "Abras." It is in this way that the first syllable of De-bung, Monastery is spelled. The spoken language of Tibet is entirely distinct from both Hindustani and Chinese. It is an agglutinative, monosyllabic tongue. We are told that neither the structure nor some acquaintance with the remarkably large vocabulary is difficult to acquire. The trouble is that almost from the outset the practical colloquial language is found by the learner to be an inextricable tangle of idioms. Noticeable is the indistinctness with which it is muttered. If you were to say to a man deliberately and slowly the Tibetan words for "call me to-morrow morning at six o'clock," he would smile politely, but make not the slightest attempt to understand. If, on the other hand, you threw at him the same words jumbled up in a polysyllabic, hyphenated utterance, you would be instantly understood.

It seems that some Tibetan words are very impressive; for example, a duck is a "mud-fowl"; to awaken is to "murder sleep"; a flower is a "button (or canopy) of fire"; a general is "Lord of the Arrow." Bribery could hardly be defined more neatly than by the Tibetan "secret push." A peculiarity of the language is the use of two opposites in conjunction to express the quality wherein they differ. Thus distance is literally "far-near," weight is "light-heavy," height is "high-low," and "cold-warm" means temperature. Such comparatively delicate shades of meaning as are required to indicate slightly varying tints in horses may readily be conveyed in Tibetan: for instance, a chestnut horse with a black mane can be described in a word.

Significant, also, is the fact that in Tibetan there is a single word for "the interdependence of causes." The capacious honorific vocabulary is a stumbling block, though for ordinary traveling purposes it is scarcely needed. The stranger will always be pardoned if he prefaces his remarks with an apology for not being able to speak the language of courtesy; but as, in spite of his protest, every remark made to him will be couched instinctively in that language, he will find himself very little advantaged.—M. W. H. in New York Sun.

Cordial Appreciation

I must write and try to tell you how much I value THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, although I can not find the words to express my appreciation. I receive much benefit weekly from reading its contents. Sometimes I have been very despondent; but when I begin to read the sermon and other uplifting matter, I soon am cheered, and receive such an uplift that "I feel like goin' on."

Take last week's issue (Jan. 25), I wish every minister of the Gospel would read and meditate upon the story in that issue, "The Heart of the World," by Dr. Sheldon. That article alone is worth more than the subscription of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for several years, in my estimation. And the sermon in this issue is also fine, helpful and uplifting, as they all are.

Making the Deaf to Hear!

Story of the Startling Experience of Mr. George P. Way, an Electrical Engineer, whose Hearing was Restored by a Remarkable Discovery.

About six years ago Mr. Geo. P. Way, electrical engineer for the Detroit Y.M.C.A., could scarcely hear the roaring of his own engines and dynamos as he passed among them. Today he is, to all appearances, possessed of perfect hearing, yet when he removes two tiny tubes, scarcely larger than a coffee bean, from his ears, he is quite as badly off as in the days when he was compelled to use an ear trumpet.

For years Mr. Way's deafness had been steadily increasing, and his usefulness as an engineer was seriously threatened. One day while at his post in the dynamo room, the buzzing in his ears, peculiar to deafness, bothered him more than usual, and he placed a curiously shaped tuft of cotton in his right ear. Then the most thrilling thing happened. Out of the most absolute silence there suddenly came a terrible crashing sound, as of an earthquake. Mr. Way bounded across the room terror stricken. It took him some time to realize that the machinery was not going to pieces and that all was as before, except for the remarkable fact that some way his hearing had been suddenly restored to him. Unconsciously he removed the tuft of cotton from his ear. Instantly the silence of years was renewed and the sound of the machinery died away. Then the truth dawned upon him.

From this discovery Mr. Way, after years of patient study and experiment, produced The Way Ear Drum.

This little contrivance, made of softest silk rubber, is worn inside the ear and is entirely invisible. It acts as a tympanum, which receives and magnifies the slightest vibration, and transmits it to the inner ear, so that those who have been entirely deaf can, with its aid, hear distinctly.

Mr. Way's discovery is not only useful in restoring hearing to the deaf, but has proved of wonderful benefit to those who feel deafness coming upon them, and is a valuable protection to the ears for those whose calling makes them liable to the loss of hearing.

Those who are afflicted with deafness or who are threatened with this great calamity, should write to Mr. Way, and learn more of his wonderful invention. When writing give the exact condition of your case, stating what you believe to be the cause of your deafness, and Mr. Way, who has made a thorough study of the ear for many years, will gladly tell you if, in his opinion, your hearing can be improved.

THE CHRISTIAN'S FOOD*

THAT was no uncommon temptation that was presented to our Lord, in the desert, when he was urged to turn the stones into bread. The same tactics are still employed. Men are told that they must live, and if they cannot live by fair means, that it is better to sacrifice principle than to starve. Christ's answer to the tempter needs to be ever kept in mind: "Man shall not live by bread alone." In the stress of modern life, there is a perpetual temptation to believe that all a man needs is creature comfort. If a man is making money, if he has the luxuries of life, we are apt to consider him a happy, as well as a prosperous man. If he is poor and has difficulty even in procuring the necessaries of life, we pity him, if we do not despise him. It is a mistake. Long ago the Preacher discovered that rich men are often impoverished in all that makes a man happy; while the poor man, with an untroubled conscience and a contented disposition leads a richer life.

How little wealth can do to satisfy the desires of the whole man is easily understood. A man of culture and learning would pine away in misery if he was separated from his books and pictures and his friends, though he possessed unlimited riches. Food for the mind he would crave and would be miserable without it. There are professors and students in our colleges who are barely able to buy necessaries, yet who lead a fuller, higher life, than many a millionaire. They are sustained by the mental food that is more to them than the physical food that the body demands. Their poor fare would disgust the gourmand, but they have food to eat that he knows not of.

Still higher, and more essential to the complete attainment of full manhood, is the nourishment of the spiritual nature. The learned man with his mind well cultivated, may be peevish, unkind, discontented, uncharitable. He may dread the grave, and the future that lies beyond it. There are simple unlettered Christians who lead a happier life. The spirit requires nourishment. Like the mind and the body, it shrivels and withers when deprived of it. It is this nourishment that Christ provides. The union between Christ and his people is so close that they derive strength from him. He supports them in trial and gives them strength to pass through ordeals that if they were unassisted would crush them. The courage of weak women who have passed through torture and martyrdom has astonished their persecutors. Men physically weak have gone triumphantly to the stake, strong in the strength that He imparts. He gives strength, too, in spiritual conflicts. The temptation that has vanquished its victim time and again finds in the converted man a resistance he never showed before. His spiritual nature has been invigorated. He has thought of Christ, has learned to love him, tried to be like him, until Christ has entered into his nature and has become a part of him. As food is administered to the starving man, who was so weak that he could not stand and he regains his strength and is able to walk; so the poor victim of sin, trembling and fainting through spiritual weakness derives, by feeding on Christ, by clinging to him and depending upon him, power to shake off his sin and go forth a free man. It is this secret of the impartation of the divine nature, that separates Christianity from all other religions. Theories and doctrines and commands all fail to change the nature; but when Christ declares that he will give his nature to those who trust him, there is hope.

The Christian who thus feeds upon Christ, who, dwelling on the fact of God in human form realizes his nearness, is himself astonished at the power that he receives. "How can you bear such affliction?" asked one Christian of another who had been stripped of all his property, bereaved of a beloved child and was himself crippled by an accident. "I do not know," was the answer, "if I had foreseen such calamities I should have despaired of holding fast my faith, but Christ has been with me and supported me. I can give you no other reason." This is the food of the Christian — the imparted nature which Christ gives to his people.

PRAYING FOR A GREAT REVIVAL

AN important meeting, representing practically all the Protestant churches, was held in the Marble Collegiate Church in New York recently. The 800 persons present prayed that a sweeping revival might take place in New York and throughout the country. Rev. F. H. Jacobs, President of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, was chairman. Among the speakers were Rev. Drs. D. J. Burrell, A. B. Simpson, W. J. Dawson, of London; C. H. Grubb and Rev. Mr. Hartley. Dr. Dawson, in urging the great need of a spiritual awakening, said:

"You can't live much longer without a revival — you, your churches, your city, your nation. A revival cannot be organized nor engineered; but you can engineer the direction of your hearts; you can organize yourselves. In the five weeks I have been here, I have heard it said that the revival is overdue. That is not true. That we are not prepared for the revival that is to come is the reason we have not yet felt its sweeping force. The great uplift in Wales has come only after twelve years of ceaseless prayer on the part of the people."

Rev. Mr. Hartley said: "I recently visited North Wales, and there I found signs of the most remarkable awakening. Thousands of the Welsh miners, whose spiritual condition, in a relative way, is not far different from that we have to face right here, have given over their evil ways. The hardened class has been touched as it will be here."

It is understood that an arrangement is in contemplation whereby Dr. R. A. Torrey and Prof. Alexander, who have been conducting successful revival work in England, will come here to labor early in the summer. Preparations are already under way for a great religious effort this year.

A NEW PHILANTHROPY

A NEW new line of philanthropy has been opened by the will of Mr. MacFerron, of Pittsburg, Pa., which has been recently offered for probate. Mr. MacFerron, who was a wealthy Scotchman, made provision for a "calamity fund" that is designed to assist those who suffer from some accident or calamity. Mr. MacFerron left a brother and two sisters, all middle aged and without children, who are the direct heirs.

It is stated in the will that "if the above mentioned legatees die without issue, I then direct that the income and proceeds from my estate be placed in the hands of the executors for the creation of a calamity fund, to be called the 'David and Eleanor MacFerron Fund.' The said fund shall be invested by the said trustees in good and safe securities, and one-half of the yearly income of the said fund shall be added to the principal thereof, and the other half shall be used for the relief of victims of public calamity in the United States of America, such calamities as fire, flood, tempest, explosions, epidemic diseases and the like, which call for prompt relief. The board of trustees of the company, acting as trustee of the above mentioned fund, to be judges of what calamity should be entitled to relief."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has always maintained that wealth was a trust, and should be used for the benefit of humanity. If other men of wealth follow the example of Mr. MacFerron, the united resources would reach such proportions as to be of incalculable benefit to the sufferers from any great calamity. The slow machinery of popular subscription would then become unnecessary.

Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Listening Machines Invente by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Ac Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?

They make the Deaf hear distinctly.

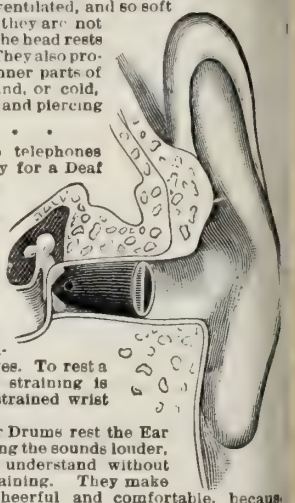
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell the are wearing them.

And, no one else can tell either, because the are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums ar to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sigh

Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just a glasses are sight-magnifiers.

They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain o them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. The can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minut just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and of

And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, be cause they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.



* * * *

These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, be cause they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, becaus such people can talk with their friends without th friends having to shout back at them. They can hea without straining. It is the straining that puts suc a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strik hard on the center of the human ear drum, instea of spreading it weakly all over the surface. I thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struc the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ea drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves When we make the drum vibrate ten times as muc we make the sound ten times as loud and ten time as easy to understand.

This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick any where in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ea Drums.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broke ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of making 326,00 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

OUR DIVINE LEADER

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE Lord had healed the man born blind, on the Sabbath day, and thereby given occasion to his enemies to nstitute this as a farther ground of accusaion against him. They had excommuniated the formerly blind man, because he ad confessed Christ. They were the rulers, olitically and spiritually, of Israel, and ad cast this man out of the synagogue, ot for any sin, but for owning Christ to be he Messiah. These were the leaders of he people, and the Lord would show them hat kind of shepherds they were. It was o them he said, "Verily, verily, I say unto ou, he that entereth not by the door into he sheepfold, but climbeth up some other ay, the same is a thief and a robber."

Here were men, leaders and teachers of he people, casting out a man from the ynagogue, and separating him from their ompany, not because he was an evil liver, ut because a wondrous miracle had been rought upon him by one who claimed to e the Son of God, and because he who ad experienced his miraculous power had wned his claim! They had obtained their uthority from man over those who were nown as Israel, the Lord's people, while ere was he of whom Jacob had prophesied as "the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel" (Gen. 49:24).

"He calleth his own sheep by name, and eadeth them out." He treads the path hich he calls them to tread, they see the ay by his footsteps. "When he hath put orth all his own, he goeth before them, nd the sheep follow him; for they know is voice." A true shepherd will never ush his sheep and urge them to go where e will not go. He makes the way for the heep by treading it first himself. Oh, ow true of our beloved Lord! He never calls us to go through what he has not first gone through, that he might make it possible for us. "He was tempted in all points like as we are" (Heb. 4:15). There can be no temptation or trial with which he is unfamiliar. He became "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;" "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted" (Isa. 53:3, 7). He went through death itself, that he might not only bear our sins, but also that not one of his sheep might go where he had not gone. And also his real presence is on before every step which we take in obedience to him.

The leaders of the Jews, always regarding the Lord Jesus as a self-made prophet, blinding themselves to the manifest proofs of his Messiahship, "understood not what things they were which he spake unto them." Then our Lord spoke explicitly, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the Door of the sheep. All that ever came before Me are thieves and robbers; but the sheep did not hear them. I am the Door: by Me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture." "All that ever came before Me." All who in any way take precedence of Christ.

The thief comes to destroy. Oh, how many souls are constantly being destroyed irremediably by false shepherds! "I am come," says our Lord, "that they may have life, and that they may have it more abundantly." "Life," eternal life, this is the great necessity; life, power to live the life of Christ, and do the will of God. Not a hopeless demand upon our fallen nature to bring forth fruits which are not indigenous; but a new life which cannot but bring forth its own fruit. No priestcraft, no ceremonies, no sacrament, can of itself produce this life. It comes from above as the direct gift of God, and can be had in no other way than by direct personal contact with God. There is no other way. "I am the good Shepherd; the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." It was not long after speaking these words that our beloved Lord suffered, and died upon the cross, thus giving his life for the sheep. And thus he obtained power to communicate his life (John 12:24).

David knew something of this long ago. "The Lord is my Shepherd." He had himself been a shepherd, and he knew how faithfully the Lord Jehovah cared for his every need. "I shall not want" is his absolute statement; it was all inclusive. Those who know the good Shepherd can never allow man to come in between them and him, they may very gratefully receive precious messages from God through man, but the Lord must always have the first, the nearest, dearest place.

A Scholar's Appreciation

After a somewhat thorough examination of one of your premium books—furnished on such liberal terms to CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers—I want to speak a few words in its praise. I refer to that most useful and thoroughly up-to-date book, The Crown Dictionary of the English Language. A well-filled and clearly-printed volume of 1,000 pages, it reflects very great credit on its compiler (Ed. T. Roe, LL.B.), and is another proof that you know exactly what your subscribers need. I prize it as a most valuable addition to that most excellent work—the best premium you ever sent out—The Crown Encyclopedia. And its size is so handy; so much easier to examine than the bulky "Unabridged" or "Standard." After the modest description you gave of this newest Dictionary, I am surprised to find that it contains so many words, and that it gives such an intelligent and yet concise definition of them. A large number of scientific words are given, especially the modern ones—far more than I expected. Then the Treasury of Facts added to the Dictionary makes it doubly valuable. The Collection of Synonyms and Antonyms, and the Dictionary of Commercial and Legal Terms given, are alone worth far more than the volume costs, to say nothing of the many other useful tables appended. You are to be congratulated for sending out, on such liberal terms, such an acceptable volume. It ought to secure many thousands of new subscribers for your, and our, invaluable CHRISTIAN HERALD.

A MASSIVE ANCIENT FORT NEAR CUZCO

THE CITY OF THE VOLCANO'S SHADOW

By A. R. STARK, Callao, Peru

BEAUTIFUL for situation is Arequipa, with its surrounding mountain elevations rising twenty thousand feet above sea-level, snow-capped peaks, cloudless skies and sierra verdure. The city, which was levelled to the ground in five minutes by a terrible earthquake one evening in the year 1868, as the sun was setting and while the church bells rang, nestles at the foot of Mount Misto, an extinct volcano.

Misti, which raises its head to an altitude of nineteen hundred feet, is a centre of interest to astronomers and naturalists. To ascend this great volcano, and descend into the yawning chasm of the crater, is a thrilling experience. It takes two days to make the ascent. As the higher elevations are reached, the ordinary traveler suffers much from mountain sickness; the eyes become dim, and the nose bleeds profusely.

Arequipa itself is called the city of the Sacred Heart. Here the Roman Church has monopolized everything for centuries. Large churches rise everywhere in the city. Church processions are of daily occurrence. Its very streets smell of incense. Women in black mantas, devoutly cross themselves, muttering, "Maria Santisima," as they pass the churches, while men occasionally raise their hats. The manufacture of huge candles and fire-crackers for the processions, gives employment to thousands of the inhabitants, and any ardent reformer who dares to expose this traffic as contrary to the teaching of the simple Gospel of Christ, is likely to share St. Paul's experience with the silversmiths of Ephesus. Without doubt, there are as many shops for the sale and repair of idols and saints as could be found in an Oriental city of equal size.

I arrived in Arequipa, small wonder! to the time of a religious procession and a band of music. But before we reached the station, I had a taste of its fanaticism, since the journey by railroad was made from Molendo in company with the Bishop of Arequipa and a party of barefooted friars. Groups of Franciscans and Dominicans had been oft among the scattered villages saying responses and prayers for the dead during the days of "All Souls."

"All Souls" is a regular harvest for these monks, some of them drawing from $200 to $400 per day. We are witnesses to the shameless traffic carried on in the cemeteries in the name of Christianity by these friars for the souls of "the departed faithful now in Purgatory," and shall never forget the sights. In South America, cemeteries are frequently divided into three sections: Heaven, Purgatory, Hell. In the section that is called "Heaven," high tariff reigns supreme.

TEACHERS AND NATIVE EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS OF AREQUIPA

1. Senor E. Forga. 2. Rev. D. Watkins. 3. J. L. Jarrett. 4. Colporteur R. Spinoza

But the current of liberty and free opinion, wafted from Protestant lands, is beginning to touch Arequipa. Recently two of our men set out for this centre of fanaticism with three large boxes of Bibles, containing four hundred weight of precious treasure. Hitherto the Bible had been banned and burned in Arequipa, and in bygone years, men were either imprisoned or expelled for selling it in the streets. To have reported the presence of a Bible-seller was sufficient to open a crater in the community and to provoke terrible eruptions, not from Mount Misti, but from the dominant priest. Today, there is a small band of followers of Jesus Christ in this centre. Our hearts were fired with greater zeal and love for the work of God and his transforming grace as we addressed these young believers. Behind the circulation of the Bible and the sowing by the human hand, has been the power of God breaking up the soil and renewing the human heart. Night by night we gather in a small room behind closed doors and windows to sing our hymns and pore over the precious Word of God. In this small audience was Senor Eduardo Forga, Peru's ablest social reformer and indefatigable temperance advocate. He belongs to one of the wealthiest families in Arequipa. Yet he gladly sacrifices the wealth and luxury of home for Christ and his cause.

THE BEAUTIFUL CATHEDRAL

Before leaving Arequipa, visitors always endeavor to inspect the Observatory. At the foot of Mount Misti, Harvard University has built a splendid edifice for photographing the Southern heavens. The Observatory, which stands at an elevation of eight thousand feet, is under the direction of Prof. Bailey, with several assistants. It is finely equipped with the best instruments.

The midnight heavens of the Southern hemisphere at this elevation present a glorious spectacle, making visible to the naked eyes several thousands of stars. Venus, queen of the heavens, shines with a wonderful brilliancy. Night by night, Prof. Bailey enters the buildings, rolls back the great dome and takes his stand beside the splendid camera, or the spectroscope or telescope, the chief instruments in the study of astronomy.

The telescope brings within the range of the human eye the orbits of thousands of mansions moving in stately order, not one of which is not greater than our own. The photographic camera fixes and determines this innumerable host of the glorious universe, or registers an eclipse or some rare incident, while the spectroscope analyzes and defines the material substances of which celestial bodies are composed.

To every Christian, the Bible is God's camera, photographing with wonderful accuracy the law of God on the "fleshly tablets" of the human heart, whereby we "are changed into the same image, from glory to glory," It is a spectroscope analyzing the divine nature of which we are made partakers and bidding us add to our faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, and love which is the bond of perfectness. Again, the Bible is a telescope, bringing within range of the human mind the teaching of Jesus Christ: "In my Father's house are many mansions"—and bringing the far-off future near, for "Behold, he cometh."

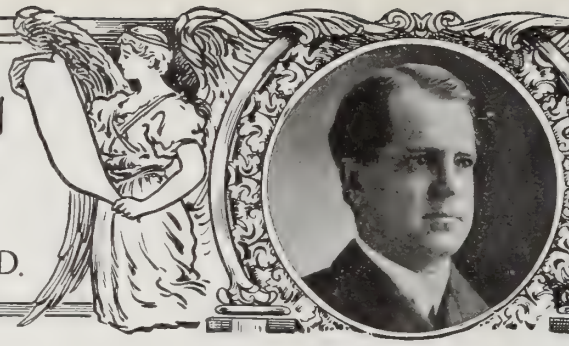
SERMON BY

Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage, D.D.



The Indorser's Entrapment

TEXT: PROVERBS 6: 2

"Thou art snared with the words of thy mouth"

THERE are many ways of killing game. The one is to go after it with gun, arrow or spear; to slay it, as "Scotty" McDougall slew Krag, the Kootenay ram of Mountain Sheep Range; or to lie in wait for it, as did Roualeyn George Gordon Cumming, the mighty "Lion Hunter" in African jungle; or to relentlessly follow it through American forests, as did Pathfinder in the old "Leather Stocking Tales;" or to course for it, as the old English sportsman with hounds, used to chase the foxes over the Lancashire Flats; or to pursue it with hawks, as the knights of old, in falconry, would hunt the birds of the air. As the eyes of the jungle monarchs, or the kings of the air, look into the fearless and unflinching eyes of man, the hunter knows that an unsteady hand, or a bullet miscarrying its mark one inch, may mean his own death. Then the "Lives of the Hunted," might become the "Lives of the Hunters."

Trappers in the Forest

Next to the actual experience of personally hunting the wild beasts of the forest, is the fascination of reading about the marvelous deeds of the sportsmen who destroy them. Hunting such animals single-handed and alone, always has had and always will have an attraction for brave men. The hunter's life is a dramatic and an exciting one. But there is a more effectual means of depopulating the forests of their game than the gun, the arrow or the spear. The trapper's work has always been more fatal to game than the aimed rifle of a Kit Carson. Where a modern American Nimrod has been able to shoot one mountain lion in a night, the trapper of the Hudson Bay Fur Company was able to come into camp, staggering under the pelts of ten, twenty, fifty wild beasts, killed in the same night. Yes, the trapper's work is the most widespread and dangerous and deadly to the wild beasts of a forest. As the Rocky Mountain bear might put his great shaggy paw into a merciless trap, whose iron jaws snap shut, and whose teeth probe their way through his flesh to the bone, this Bible scene of my text describes the predicament of the indorser, who foolishly becomes the guarantor of a friend or an acquaintance's honor. As old Bruin tugs and pulls to get his leg loose, and keeps on tugging and pulling, until, at last, he pulls off his leg, he typifies the predicament of the unfortunate man who has become a surety for his friend. "My son," said he,"if thou be a security for thy friend, . . . thou art snared with the words of thy mouth, thou art taken with the words of thy mouth." It is maiming or destruction by an unseen trap. The indorser's dangers are great, I preach this sermon to warn my hearers and readers against these ensnarements which are set for many of us. And when I warn you against the indorser's perils, I also warn you against the sins of an unjust recommendation of incompetent friends or mere acquaintances, for positions which you do not positively know they are able to fill. These two evils come in the same category.

The Victim Beguiled

Why is the indorser's predicament like that of a wild beast caught in a trap? First, because he is enticed into its dangers unawares. He does not seek them out of a silly curiosity, or from mere idle desire, like the antelopes that come nearer and nearer to the white flag waved by the hunters lying hidden in the grass. He does not charge them, as a wounded stag might turn upon the hounds, or an angry boar, caring not what happens, might rush against the fatal spear held out for his destruction. But the indorser goes into his trap as unsuspectingly and innocently as the wild turkeys are caught. The trappers build a cage with a small opening. Then they scatter corn along the path leading to the cage; and the wild turkeys, with their heads down picking up the corn, walk into the trap, and when they lift their heads, they cannot see the exit, and are easily slain.

Indorsers are innocently caught in a trap. How? The merchant is sitting in his office and a friend enters. He says, "Hello, Mr. So-and-So, I am glad to find you in. I am in a financial hole and want you to help me out. You know spring is here, and I must lay in my goods now for the winter. My business was never better than now, nor prospects brighter. However, in order to compete with my rivals, I must branch out and get more stock. The wholesale firms say, if you will indorse my note, they will let me have the goods. Of course there is absolutely no danger of your ever being called upon to pay. Will you indorse for old friendship's sake?" You pin the man down. By long argument, he seems to prove that there is no possible danger of your being compelled to pay. Then, for friendship's sake, you sign the fatal note.

Evading Responsibity

Or, perhaps, the man wants a responsible position. He is about to be appointed cashier of some institution. He says he must have certain indorsers, and down goes your name. Now, my brother, it would be all right for you to sign your name there, if you felt you could afford to make good that pledge, if it ever came back to you. But the trouble is that most of us, with our present financial struggles, cannot afford to pay. Ay, I go farther than this; nine men out of ten; ninety-nine men out of a hundred; nine hundred and ninety-nine men out of a thousand, never can pay, or intend to pay the notes they indorse for the benefit of their friends. As soon as the notes fall due and come back upon the indorsers, they begin to squirm and twist, and trv to wriggle out of their difficulties. Sometimes by fair, but alas! often by foul means, they try to shirk and repudiate their debts of indorsement, even as some dishonest men clear off their debts by putting their money in their wives' names, and then going into a bankruptcy court, ask for a clean financial sheet.

Is not the picture true? What would you do, if you were asked to pay the dishonest debts of your friends which you indorsed? Would you do it? Would you do it, even if you had indorsed their notes and could find a loophole to crawl out? Would you do it, as did Sir Walter Scott? Would you do it, even though it cost you your life to die an honest man? Dare you, with your present financial burdens, risk the sinful temptation of repudiation, which you mav have to face, if you become a financial surety for a friend?

Innocent Sufferers

But as I see the old mother bear struggling to get her paw out of the fatal trap, I do not pity her, even with all her sufferings, nearly as much as I do the little cubs who are dependent upon her for their lives. As I see a man struggling in the indorser's trap, with all his misfortunes I do not feel nearly as sorry for him as I do for his wife, and especially for his children, who are dependent upon him for financial support. Yet to hear some people talk, you would suppose that in order to be kind, loving, big-hearted, generous, a man should be ready to help all his friends and, when they need it, to sign all their notes, no matter what might be the financial danger that man may run in reference to his own children. Now, my friends, I believe one of the best tests of a true, big-hearted man, is not how he looks after his friends' notes so much as how he first looks after his own flesh and blood.

Do you mean to tell me there is any honor, any justice, any big-heartedness in a man going upon a friend's note, when, in order to do it, he may have to take the very bread out of his children's mouths and the clothing off their backs, and the old homestead away from their inheritance? This is just what many men have done in order to win the name of being big-hearted. I recall to mind one of this type, whom the world eulogized as a kind man, but who purchased that eulogy at a fearful price. The man of whom I speak was for years the president of a New York company. His income was at least $20,000 per year; but though he made much, he spent much. Every person in distress could go to him for succor and get it. His name was on scores of notes. Every little while, he would gather five, ten, fifteen of his daughters' friends together, and give them a banquet and a "good time." The last act of his life was to buy a family plot for a policeman who was about to bury his little girl. When that man died, the beautiful acts of kindness which he did were recounted at his bier.

But would you like me to tell you the aftermath, or the second sowing of that life of indiscriminate generosity? The notes he had signed for friends his estate had to pay. The moneys he had loaned, here and there and everywhere, were never paid back. Caring for everyone but those of his own house, he became in the sight of God worse than an infidel. His two daughters, to whom he could deny nothing when he was alive, had to deny themselves everything when he was dead. His only son, the pride of his heart; the boy to whom he gave unlimited pocket-money and sent across the seas on pleasure trips, applied a few years ago in Chicago for the position of a janitor, and he could not get work at that. This was the aftermath of the career of a man who purchased the unstable friendships of a fleeting moment by being untrue to the best interests of his own wife and children. Now, men, you have no right to help your brother with an indorsement, if at the same time it compels you to become untrue to those who are dependent upon you. You have no right to give the luxuries to your neighbors, until you first provide the necessities for your own household. Can you afford to pay that indorsement for your friend? Dare you risk the temporal, and perhaps the spiritual welfare of your children, by that hidden trap?

Unwise Kindness

But another danger lurks over the indorser's trap. By going upon a friend's note, a man may be teaching his friend to be careless, ay, sinfully careless with money. Dr. Bowers once wrote, "Temptation resembles the rocks which rest their jagged sides above the waves when it is low water. No vessel dare come near them. But after awhile, the tide comes sweeping into the bay, and buries the rocks under a flood of water, so that the largest ships may ride in safety above their teeth of death together with the lightest skiff." That is a beautiful oratorical figure. But the incoming tide will soon be the outgoing tide. Then woe betide the boat that lingers there over the jagged rocks of death! Yet the temporary financial help we give our brothers by indorsement or unjust credit, may be the means of carrying them into a position where they shall soon meet temporal as well as spiritual shipwreck.

Why temporal and spiritual wreck? you ask. In the first place, I start with the premise that many people are tempted just as much as they can bear. Place upon them one extra temptation and you may lead them to become dishonest men and women. For instance, the other day I was reading about one of the great preventatives of crime, which was decreasing the proportion of the number of our criminals. This preventative is the registering machine, which is now placed at almost every cashier's desk and in every street car. No sooner is the five-cent piece collected, than the conductor has to ring up the fare. No sooner is the spool of cotton, or the pound of sugar, or coffee bought, than the register records the sale. At the end of the day, the clerks or conductors must have their registers tally with the amount of money on hand. Temptation is now being placed at a minimum. Lessen the temptation to crime and you lessen the number of future criminals.

Encourages Temerity

This premise granted, do you not see how you increase the temptations of your friends if you place money in their hands for which they are unable to give security? You practically say to that young man, "Here, my friend, is my capital. You are worth nothing. You take this money and I will trust you." What thought then is apt to come to that young man? He says to himself, "If I risk that money, I may be able to double it. If I lose it, why, then I might as well be financially lost for a sheep as for a kid. I am worth nothing now. I shall be no worse off even if I fail." And what is the result? We see thousands of men going into wildcat speculations with other people's funds. We see thousands upon thousands of dollars lost, because men are risking money which is not their own. My friend, as an indorser, you have no right to lead your brother into temptation. If a brother has no money and no security, do not teach him how to be criminally reckless with capital not his own.

But a man to become a security for a friend, or an acquaintance, does not necessarily have to sign a note for money. He can give to an acquaintance a letter of recommendation. That letter may be of more value than money. When Ulysses S. Grant formed his mous Wall Street partnership with Ferdinand Ward, did not put into that firm much money. Though he d been Lieutenant-General, and twice President of e United States, he never had much money. He lived d died a poor man. But he had more than money. e gave Ferdinand Ward a financial standing in the siness community and the confidence of the public. e multitudes of admirers of the hero of Appomattox ured their wealth into his office. As a result, Ward s able to cheat the trustful public out of its hundreds thousands. For the crime of that misappropriation, ard was sent to prison. What Ulysses S. Grant did r Ferdinand Ward, some of us, on a small scale, have en doing for our friends and acquaintances. If a an is out of a position and wants help, we say "Silver d gold have I none, but such as I have, give I unto ee." This, however, is not the gift of grace, but of false letter of recommendation. We frequently give ch letters of recommendation when we know that the n to whom we give them are incompetent, or at least known to us, and the result is that there are thousands frauds being perpetrated all over the country, not cause bad men are instigating them—there are bad n everywhere—but because good men have allowed eir names to be linked to those frauds carelessly. d there are thousands of good men out of the posi-ons in life which they are qualified to fill, merely be-use mediocre and incompetent men, for friendship's ke, have been pushed into those positions by what is mmonly termed a "pull." My brother, never be surity for a friend, unless you are first sure that what u recommend by letter, is "the truth, the whole ith and nothing but the truth."

But my text has even a wider sweep. If men despise those for whom we unwisely have become sureties, they are apt to despise us also. And if they learn to despise us, they are very apt to learn to despise the religion we represent; for, say what you will, every unfaithful Christian is a representative, however sadly delinquent, of the God in whom he professes to believe. We are, or should be, the lights of the world—the cities set upon a hill and which cannot be hid. If we are unfaithful in our dealings with others, our faithlessness reflects on religion and is an offense against God himself. This fact is never better demonstrated than when a minister is untrue to his Divine Master and his sacred calling. At the public funeral of a worldly man or a worldly woman, sometimes, in order to give comfort to the living, a minister will try to smooth things over, though the dead man may have been an extortioner, a drunkard, a libertine, a gambler, or a despiser of the church of the Lord Jesus Christ. Of course we should speak no evil of the dead, and it is not necessary that any one should cause pain by reflections at a funeral, but surely there is a limit to post-mortem laudation. Yet he will talk about a twelve-gated gospel; he will say there was pardon for Paul, who was the chief of sinners, and, therefore, there is pardon for us. He will not quote the passage, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish;" but he will talk from the text, "God is love;" and he will try to make people believe that the unrepentant soul has entered through the Paradisaical gates. But I tell you, my brother, even with the men of the world, it won't go down. If we dishonor ourselves by trying to become a surety for our friends, we dishonor God also.

I once heard a minister dishonor God in this way. Many years ago, out in the country, a person of evil life was buried. That life had been wholly a worldly life; but in order to please the relatives, who were members of his church, the minister whitewashed the record, and though the dead had died, as far as we knew, unrepentant, the indulgent speaker opened the gates of heaven and had the departed living in the whitest mansion, nearest to the Great White Throne. After the service was ended, a man of the world said to me, "What does that minister mean by talking like that? If heaven is for such a one, then I am sure of reaching there, blasphemer as I am." No, my friends, you cannot be untrue in your commendations or recommendations without at the same time dishonoring Him, of whom, you, as Christians, are the representatives.

I would beseech of you, therefore, in the smallest details of your life, always remember you are the representatives of Jesus Christ. Spurgeon once said, "Many horses fall at the bottom of a hill, because the driver thinks the danger past, and the need to hold the reins with firm grip less pressing." Many men lose their Christian discipleship at the foot of the hill, after they have climbed Calvary and descended on the other side. They lose it, because they do not serve God in the little things. They lose it, because they needlessly throw themselves into temptations by becoming false sureties for their friends. They lose it, because, unthinkingly, they throw moral dangers in the way of others. They lose it, because, when they dishonor themselves, they dishonor Christ. May God help us, one and all, to be true to Christ; then we shall be true to our fellow-men in every way.

Closing Relief Work at the Bowery Mission

ON April 1st, the "Early Morning Breakfasts" at the Bowery Mission ll close for the season. It s never been the purpose of E CHRISTIAN HERALD to olong its winter work into e summer, and as the rigors an exceptionally severe nter season are almost over, s particular branch of ac-ity will be suspended until xt Thanksgiving morning.

To those readers of THE RISTIAN HERALD who have ntributed to this much-eded work we tender our st heartfelt thanks. If ey could have come into rsonal contact with the ousands of men who have en helped physically and iritually by these breakfasts ey would have felt them-lves amply repaid.

When the last roll and cup coffee are dispensed on the rning of April 1st 129,000 eakfasts will have been ven since Thanksgiving rning last. We are in a sition to say that in almost ery case recipients were in re need. The fact that they ere there, in the cold streets, one o'clock in the morning, ith a prospect of several hours' weary trudging before ylight, proved their need. And we comforted rselves each morning by remembering that when the aster was called upon to feed a great hungry multi-de he did not stop to discriminate. It was enough r Him that they were hungry.

The arrangement of the breakfasts have been under e immediate supervision of the assistant superinten-nt, Mr. Long, who has been helped by a loyal and defatigable staff. The most perfect order has been aintained. Some hundreds have, through the instru-entality of the breakfasts, been led to attend our eetings, and have become savingly converted.

A great majority of the men who were furnished with nployment through the Free Labor Bureau were gen-ally useful men, handy in various ways, and able and illing to make themselves serviceable. On farms, in ores, in homes, and in other places they are now prov-g their willingness and efficiency. Quite a number e on farms with the prospect of being engaged during e coming spring and summer.

The breakfasts have been visited by many ministers, Christian workers, philanthropists and sociologists, who have never failed to become impressed with the pathos of the scene.

From appearances, it seems likely that, nothwithstanding all the enormous increase of our city and national wealth, the Bowery will continue, for many years to come, to be the abode of the "submerged," and so long will the Bowery Mission continue this branch of its helpful work.

As a direct outcome of the Bread-Line, the Free Employment Bureau came into existence on Jan. 1. There were so many young, sturdy and apparently sober men in the line, that it seemed imperative some special effort should be made to find work for them. The labor market of the city was so glutted, that we knew it was little use attempting to find positions for them within city limits.

Then came Dr. Klopsch's offer to pay transportation to a distance of fifty miles from the city. And in country places, from Jan. 1 to March 15, 503 men have been placed in good positions, at reasonable living wages, and, in many cases, in Christian homes. The tabulated statement appended, showing the number given employment, will be interesting.

Out of the 503 men provided with positions, nearly all have turned out well. It is with very great regret that we announce that this special branch of work will also have to be discontinued at the same time as the Early Morning Breakfasts. The cost of running the Bureau has been very heavy. The correspondence involved has been enormous, the work of registering, examining, selecting, and dispatching the men has necessitated a special staff, whilst the work of sheltering, boarding, and, in some instances, clothing likely candidates, has had to be undertaken.

It will, however, be the aim of the Mission, with the help of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, to reopen the Bureau in the fall, and any contributions sent in for the purpose of assisting this truly beneficent work, will be held for that purpose.

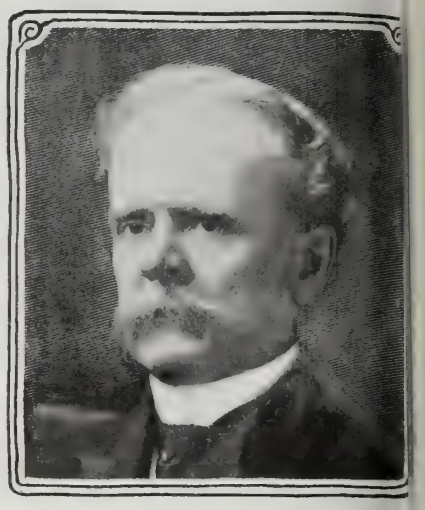
IS THE "SIMPLE LIFE" POSSIBLE HERE?

A Problem of Vital Interest Answered by the Leading Thinkers of the Nation

REV. JOSEPH SWAIN, L.L.D.

GEN. OLIVER OTIS HOWARD

BISHOP GEO. F. SEYMOUR



REV. AMORY H. BRADFORD, D.D.

"IS it possible to live the Simple Life in America—especially in our great cities?"

This question, which has special reference to the ideas set forth in The Simple Life, by Pastor Charles Wagner, was put by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to a number of leaders of modern thought and activity in various fields, including bishops, well-known ministers, authors of both sexes, college presidents, statesmen and government officials.

Some critics have averred that Pastor Wagner's Simple Life philosophy is impossible for the hurried, worried American, living in a great city. Others declare that it is pure idealism, and therefore unattainable; while still others say it is only "a passing fad."

On the other hand, many believe that America has received a special blessing in Wagner's words, and quote President Roosevelt as authority for the statement. "I was astonished," said Mr. John Wanamaker, "when I learned that Mr. Wagner has only $1,400 a year. He lives in a humble cottage, the rent of which is not more than $30 a month. I asked him to show me the room in which he wrote his books. He showed me the attic. He lives indeed a simple life amid humble surroundings. Like Luther and Wesley and John the Baptist, he has come to preach the Word in a way that we cannot help understanding."

The Simple Life teaches the more spiritual and less worldly manner of living. How are we, confronted constantly by the spirit of commercialism, to decide what is essential and what merely secondary? In short, is it possible for us to practice the philosophy of the Simple Life—especially in great cities—in simplicity of thought, and speech and intercourse with men; in simple duty, simple needs and pleasures, and in simple home life?

HON. ED. A. MOSELEY

These were some of the questions asked by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The replies, given below, make a timely Symposium of very general human interest:

"Some of the Most Strenuous Lives are, Nevertheless, Simple"

It is certainly difficult to practice the quiet, peaceful life in the great American cities; but I think it possible to practice the Simple Life anywhere. Some of the most strenuous and hurried lives are nevertheless simple. Daily duty, home life, and innocent pleasures may be simple anywhere.

"A National Drift Away From it is Bound to Mean National Disaster"

I am sure that the Simple Life is possible for every one in America who really desires it, and that a national drift in the other direction is bound to mean national disaster.

"The Simple Life is the Mother of Intellectual Discrimination."

The Simple Life is, first, a mother of intellectual discrimination. After that, it is a mother of appreciation of the heart and of decisive move of the will.

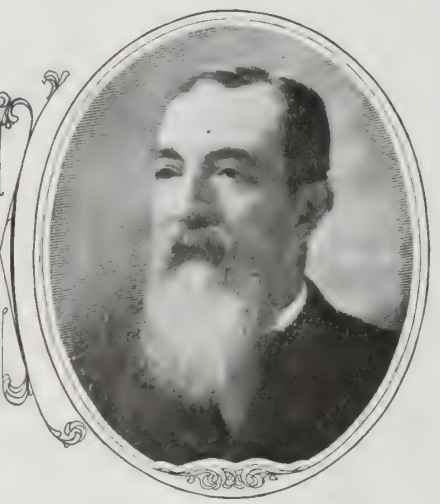
HON. ELLIS H. ROBERTS



BISHOP ALPHEUS W. WILSON

"Society makes Man the Creature of Environment"

There is nothing impossible about the Simple Life which Wagner suggests. All feel that, in modern society, the person is too much the creature of his material environment, whereas he should make his surroundings contribute to his own development, and use that development in the service of his fellows. Where a man has all the food that he needs for the proper care of his body, he has enough, and the same principle applies to clothing.

I think that we can all learn a lesson from the suggestions made by Wagner. While it is always difficult to live up to a high ideal, it is necessary to have the ideal constantly in view to make any progress whatever. Mr. Wagner's suggestions are, as I believe, helpful, and in the line of progress.

"The Simple Life is in the Man, Not in His Surroundings"

Concerning the practicability of the Simple Life in America, any follower of Jesus Christ should be able to answer, "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." Whether in the city or in the country this must be true. The complexity of conditions cannot confuse the vision and purpose of the single-minded man. It is not a question of physical life merely, or of outward relations. No man can absolutely determine these for himself. His environment—or, as religious men would say, his providential setting—has more to do with these than his own will.

But the whirl and excitement of social, business or political life can never rob a true man, an honest believer in Jesus Christ, of the simplicity and integrity of character and life which fit in any conditions, urban or rural, and are the only guarantee of final success in any sphere. The Simple Life is in the man, not in his surroundings.

ALPHEUS W. WILSON,

(Methodist) Bishop of Baltimore, Md.

"The 'Smart Set' and the 'Wall Street Set' Not Typical of America"

I have been very much interested in Mr. Wagner's book The Simple Life. It is true, on the one hand, that the life of the world has grown, of necessity, very much more complex, with all the vastly increased mutual relations among men, and the great opportunities made by the discoveries and adaptations of science. On the other hand, the essentials of the Simple Life are possible, even under the most complex conditions, and every man who is successful in the broad sense, has shown his ability to eliminate the needless confusion and complexity, and to live simply, even when others are not doing so.

I think Pastor Wagner is quite right in saying that at the bottom of our national life, there is great simplicity. The "Smart Set" are not typical of America, nor indeed is the Wall Street Set; but the great engineers, the great teachers, the great statesmen, the great naturalists, the great men of every kind, are men who go straight to the thing which is to be done, neither worried nor confused by outside relations and this is the essence of what Wagner means.

It is part of the art of living to decide what is essential, and what is merely secondary, and just as men can "walk in hallowed cathedrals," according to Thoreau's word, no matter where they may actually be, so it is possible to practice the Simple Life in great cities, as well as in small ones, or in the woods. Where a man goes straight to what he is doing, avoids all needless and cumbersome secondary matters, and looks after the substance, the essentials of the Simple Life will be found.

Our National Well-Being Depends Upon Our People Living the Simple Life"

In my opinion, it is quite possible to live the Simple Life, not only in America at large, but even in the great cities. And it is not only possible, but the continuance of our well-being as a people depends upon the fact that the great majority of the people shall do so.

We may admit that life in great cities, with flat dwellings, club life, high prices, temptations to make display and to live up to or beyond one's means, to avoid having children, tends to sap the virility of American life; but the people who are too selfish and luxurious to have children, and to bring them up in a simple and God-fearing way, if they do have them, die off. Their places are taken by recruits from the comparatively simple life of the smaller towns and the country.

If Christianity continues to influence the lives of the people; if people keep the Lord's Day and go to church; if they will try to show a real Christian fellowship toward others, then the Simple Life can be lived in city as well as country.

(Episcopal) Bishop of Minnesota.

"The Example of Thousands in America Answers, 'Yes'"

Does the French pastor really teach a new doctrine? Is the essence of his words creed or cult? Rather is it not an appeal for unselfish, high-minded, cheerful conduct? Evidently, in his visit to this country, he did not deem it necessary to avoid society, to hold aloof from costly banquets, and from meetings with prominent and fashionable people. His example bears on his views of simplicity of life.

Human life cannot be other than complex. Mr. Wagner has aroused interest in the commandment to love one's neighbor as one's self. Doubtless he has brought blessing. He has not changed the conditions under which men must live; he has given voice to aspirations, to purposes, to the brotherhood of man. He has not set limits to the comforts of home, to friendly intercourse, to the study of literature and art. Whatever is best in the words of Wagner, is an echo from Nazareth, and Galilee, and Jerusalem. The Simple Life, so far as it is real, and not a poetic ideal, is the Christian life.

"Is it possible to live such a life, especially in great cities?" The example of thousands all over our country answers Yes. That example is not perfect, but it is approximate, and ever nobler, and purer, and more consecrated.

"The Doctrines Advocated in the 'Simple Life' Are the Doctrines of the Quakers"

I believe it is possible for us to live the Simple Life in America, even in our great cities. I believe the doctrines advocated by Charles Wagner in his book, are the doctrines always held by the religious Society of Friends, and which were beautifully acknowledged by the celebrated author himself in his lecture at Swarthmore College, when he said that he was delighted to find here a people (the Friends), that were living the life which he was talking about. The Simple Life of Charles Wagner is a masterly presentation of the beautiful teachings of Jesus.

"Something to be Worked out by Unselfish Devotion to the Interest of Others"

By a question, you help me to answer all that you require touching my opinion of the Simple Life. You ask, "Is it possible for us to practice the philosophy of the Simple Life—especially in great cities—in simplicity of thought and speech, and intercourse with men?" I answer yes; in simple duty, simple needs and pleasures, and in a simple home life. It is something to be worked out by unselfish devotion to the interest of those around about us, on the part of all, including the millionaires—all who can give money or service, or both. The divine aid is always ready for those who will try to show actual love, like the good Samaritans, for one's neighbors.

"Emerson's Doctrine of Plain Living and High Thinking Not Obsolete"

I do not see why the Simple Life may not be lived in America. Surely Emerson's doctrine of "plain living and high thinking" is not obsolete. And it is in every one's power to choose whether he will struggle for the brief rewards of a worldly life, or live the life of the Spirit.

"The Simple Life Possible Anywhere and at Any Time"

I think it is quite possible to live the Simple Life, anywhere and at any time, provided people have the spirit of it and the desire for it. Without these, it will always be difficult.

"The Qualities that Are Needed for Living the Simple Life"

I do not live in a great city, but in a busy one, and I lead a busy life. I do, however, think it is possible to live the Simple Life in America, even in great cities.

I believe that character is, to some degree at any rate, independent of circumstances. The secret of simplicity lies not in one's surroundings at all, but in one's self. It depends not on things, but on one's attitude to things. It is the single eye that, looking out upon things, looks through things that are secondary and passing, to the chief things and the things that will last.

It is the simplicity of nobly ordered minds, of homes characterized by plain living and high thinking, where dwells the spirit of love, joy and peace.

(Episcopal) Bishop of Connecticut.

"Intellectual Integrity, Unaffected Utterance and Plain Living, the Chief Essentials"

Of course it is possible to live the Simple Life in America in a great city, or anywhere else. The Simple Life is a state of mind, and not a matter of mere outward semblance. Different people have different ways of leading it. To be honest with one's self and honest with every one else, is the chief thing. Not to have too high an opinion of one's self, and not to "play to the galleries" is the next thing.

If the author of The Simple Life had called it "The Unaffected Life," he would have come nearer describing what he wanted. I do not know who it was that said Charles Wagner's Simple Life philosophy is "impossible for the hurried, worried American living in a great city." Being unaffected, refraining from making one's self conspicuous seems to be not impossible for any plain gentleman. It may be impossible for the "hurried worried American;" but all he has got to do in order to make it possible, is to quit being "hurried and worried," to cultivate a spirit of contentedness more, and a spirit of ambition and ostentation less. The simplest and most successful life, with least affectation and hurry and worry; with the greatest reliance upon essentials, and the most complete indifference to non-essentials—including wealth and "fads" of all sorts—that I have ever read of, is the Life of Jesus of Nazareth.

You ask, "Is it possible to practice the philosophy of the Simple Life in great cities, in simplicity of thought and speech, and intercourse with men?" It is not only possible, but it is natural, and the man who does not do it is simply affected. It is not only not impossible for the average American citizen to live a Simple Life, but the real average American citizen, whether in a city or in the country, does live it—not always, perhaps, with the highest ideals, but with an approximation to them.

"It is an Approach to the Perfect Life Sketched by Our Saviour"

As I understand the Simple Life contemplated by Pastor Wagner, it is an approach to the Perfect Life sketched by our Saviour, as presented to us in the Gospel. This is attainable by gradual approach, through the help of God himself, and though not reached in perfection here, it will be realized hereafter by those who choose the better way, in the life to come. "Be ye perfect," enjoins our Lord, "even as your Father in heaven is perfect."

It is no argument against this ideal of perfection, which was made real before our eyes in the person of Jesus Christ in our human life, lying between birth and death, where our life now lies, to say that it is unattainable. The point is, and the great point, that it is an ideal lifted up before us, towards which we must strive. This is the secret of the prayers in the old liturgies, which ask for perfection, in life, and practice, and manners, as the good gift of God.

(Episcopal) Bishop of Illinois.

"As Easy to Live the Simple Life Here as Anywhere"

It is as easy to live the Simple Life in America as in any other country. It is quite certain that the Simple Life is not the life of a simpleton. It is a life not dependent for its realization so much on environment as upon inherent characteristics. Strenuosity in outward activity is not opposed to simplicity in inward feeling, motive and purpose. Simplicity is opposed to duplicity, to assumption, pretension, and all forms of dissimulation and deceit. Thus defined, the Simple Life can be lived anywhere. Thus defined, its philosophy is not pure idealism. True

Our "Simple Life" Symposium

THAT the Simple Life is a vital issue, and not an abstract philosophy, is made clear in the very remarkable Symposium which appears in the present number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Among the contributors are many of those foremost in thought and action in the nation's affairs—men and women whose opinions on matters of public interest carry weight at all times, and especially so when, as in the present instance, the subject is one upon which largely depend the future welfare and happiness of the American people.

That the Simple Life is attainable, even amid our very complex and peculiar social and business conditions, seems to be the ruling opinion of a majority of these writers, and it must be admitted that, from any ordinary point of view, they set forth excellent reasons for this belief. Some even urge that the spirit and character of our institutions, and the principles laid down by the founders, are more favorable to such a mode of life here than in other lands. It may be asserted, on the other hand, that we have traveled far from the plane of simple, unaffected American citizenship, as it was in the earlier days, and that the average citizen of our Republic to-day has a different and less favorable environment.

But Pastor Wagner, if we interpret him aright, meant to deal with the individual, rather than with the mass. He defined the Simple Life as a "state of mind." He said, in substance, that it did not depend upon any certain social or economic conditions, but expressed itself in simplicity in our needs, our pleasures, our desires, our home-life; in straightforwardness in word and deed; in kindly candor and gentleness to all; in recognition of the good we find in others, the repression of all envy, foolish extravagance and display, absence of vanity and affectation, a wholesome appreciation of the blessings we enjoy, and a disregard for what Wagner characteristically terms the "brushwork" of social convention, which so greatly interferes with our clear view of the real mission of life, and consequently destroys much happiness.

Such is the Paris Mission pastor's own definition of his philosophy, which has set a considerable portion of the world to thinking. It is not by any means a new Gospel, but is as old as Christianity itself, though not synonymous with it. Without Christ in the heart, the Simple Life is an impossibility. If Pastor Wagner had said: "Seek ye first the Kingdom and all these things will be added unto you," he would have reached the mark with greater directness; for, after all, what is the Simple Life but the life of the Christian, whose days are filled with richer blessings than the world can give, whose heart overflows with love for his fellow-men, and who realizes as no other can, the eternal truth that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

A Word for the Boy

NOT our girls only, but their brothers in the years that are leading them toward manhood, need the sympathetic and ceaseless guardianship of their mothers. Nobody so easily drifts into a false position as a youth, at the turning point between boyhood and manhood. Nobody is so likely to be at the mercy of passions that he does not understand; nobody may be so unhappily ruined by a single false step, a single yielding to temptation. Girls are free from danger, from the grosser temptations which attack boys in unwary hours. The folly of the spendthrift is often but the seamy side of generosity, and recklessness may have had its root in headlong daring and fine courage. An unscrupulous and evil-minded man or woman may gain an insidious influence with a boy, and, unsuspected by parents, turn him in the wrong direction at the critical moment when the forces of good are striving with those of wickedness for the mastery in his nature.

A mother should not for an instant drop her hold upon her boy's love, nor flaw his ideal of her as the purest and noblest of women. During his adolescence she may have to stand up for him in many a crisis. When others have small toleration for him and little patience with his faults, she may be obliged to exercise both, and she must do this without condoning what is wrong in his conduct.

Boys have a hard battle to fight on their way to clean manhood and good citizenship. A mistake now and then, a folly that seems incomprehensible to older men who have forgotten that once they were young, need not be taken as ill-omens for the future. In moments of youthful effervescence, mothers and fathers too, must stand beside their boys, and help them against every opposing voice and hand. If a boy has gone wrong and is penitent the home door should never be shut against him, nor the parental heart. In the touching story of the prodigal son, he who was Son of Man for every age, as well as Son of God, voiced the grandeur of fatherhood.

Waiting Upon God

MUCH has been written and printed concerning the extraordinary revival in Wales, and many attempts have been made to analyze it, for the purpose of discovering the secret of its wonderful power in drawing multitudes into the Kingdom. Famous preachers and brilliant magazinists, who have personally witnessed many of the manifestations, have endeavored to account for the tremendous scope and power of the spiritual wave that is now sweeping over that land. On the whole, such explanations have been unsatisfactory. These observers have looked at the results only, without taking into account and almost without knowing anything about antecedent conditions.

From a Canadian pastor, the Rev. A. E. Steuernagel, of Bethany Tabernacle, Peterboro, Ontario, we have received what seems to be the first clear and explicit statement of the conditions that preceded the revival, and they are all-important as an object-lesson, and also as an encouragement to those in other localities, who have long been hoping and praying for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

Revivals that are man-made—that are deliberately planned and arranged for on merely human lines—never culminate. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou canst not tell whence it cometh nor whither it goeth; so it is with every one that is born of the Spirit." No organization, no church, no man or group of men, planned the Welsh revival; yet for many long years God's people there were preparing for it, by faithfulness at the family altar, in Bible study, at public worship, and by unceasing prayer. It was as though an army had put on its weapons and stood fully equipped, only waiting the voice of the commander to choose the time and place of the battle and to direct the host. They were literally "waiting upon God," and he at length rewarded their patience and fidelity, and gloriously answered their prayers.

In the calling of Evan Roberts, the unknown student who, like another David, was divinely drawn to the conflict, we have a still further illustration of that strange Providence whose mysterious movings none can foresee. Men of high talent in the pulpit, whose fine abilities made them most desirable leaders in many fields, were all set aside for this simple-hearted, indifferently-educated lad, with no oratorical skill and no visible gifts. He was armed with the Sword of the Spirit alone when he was thus chosen; but all his young life he had "waited upon God," and when the call came suddenly, he was ready.

There is another feature of this great revival that should not be overlooked. It is found in the conditions that were everywhere urged upon the people as absolutely essential to the success of the work. These are:

Every sin must be confessed to God and renounced;
Every wrong done to others must be set right where possible, and restitution made;
All doubtful acts, habits, associations must be renounced and forsaken;
We must yield a prompt and implicit obedience to the Divine Spirit and its teachings;
We must make public confession of Christ,

Some notable spiritual outpourings have recently taken place in our own land, especially in the West, where the work seems to be genuine and thorough. In the East, too, prayers have been ascending to the Throne for a widespread spiritual refreshing. We commend, therefore, to devout Christians everywhere, the lessons of this great revival abroad, which show conclusively that continued and faithful waiting upon God and perfect obedience to the Spirit must precede all su movements. These alone create the atmosphere which the Spirit moves upon the hearts of men and wi them to Christ.

A Story for the Million

Ten Superb Easter Gifts

TWO years ago we published our Family Art Galler aggregating one thousand square inches of t choicest reproductions of ten of the world's maste pieces in their original colors. Among these ten we ma specially mention Schenck's "Lost Sheep," Rosa Bo heur's "Horse Fair," and Schreyer's "Arab Warriors, three pictures, the originals of which the Metropolita Museum of Art values at $86,000. Every one of the te pictures is a beauty.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD went to enormous expense t publish these pictures, in honor of its twenty-fifth ann versary, and nothing else that we have ever sent out ha won such enthusiastic and universal commendation.

Heretofore, this Family Art Gallery has been sold a twenty-five cents. To close out the stock, we offer small lot at fifteen cents, for each Gallery delivered Just think of it! Ten superb pictures in original colo for only fifteen cents. For two Galleries ordered at th same time, send us twenty-five cents.

This is a great opportunity, and we commend it to th favorable consideration of every subscriber to TH CHRISTIAN HERALD who does not already possess thi Family Art Gallery of the world's masterpieces.

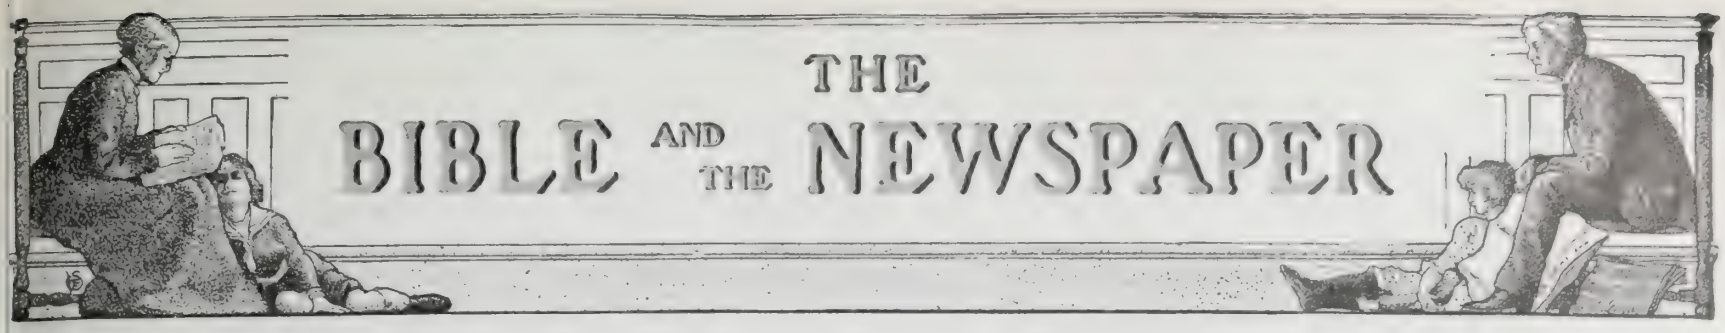
Among the Workers

—ACCORDING TO a contemporary, there are some 400, 000 preachers of all denominations in the United States whose average salaries do not exceed $500 each.

—UNDER THE LEADERSHIP of Chaplain Axton, a Youn Men's Christian League of fifty-three men, is doing activ Christian work among the soldiers at Fort Leavenworth Kan., the largest army post in the United States.

—PRESIDENT MARY E. WOOD, of the Jay, Keene an Lake Placid W. C. T. U., writes that after a hard cam paign by people, pastors, and the W. C. T. U., the pop ulation of these localities can now thank God that "n license" has won the day. In Jay, the ministers worke all day at the polls. The ladies served free dinners t many voters. Among those who were prominent in th campaign besides the ladies, were Rev. J. M. Cass, M. E Church; Rev. Warren Taylor, Baptist Church; Rev. Mr Thompson, and Rev. Messrs. Alford, Knapp and Bar rett. The battle was won amid unbounded enthusiasm.



A Royal Betrothal

OFFICIAL announcement is made of an engagement uniting the Royal Family of England with that of Sweden and Norway. Prince Gustav, the grandson of King Oscar, eldest son the Crown Prince, is to be married to Princess Marret, the eldest daughter of the Duke of Connaught, other of King Edward. The royal lady is twenty-ree years of age, and is ten months older than her ture husband. She is described as charming in man-r, popular both in England and Ireland, an excellent usician, and a skilful artist. She is also a fearless rsewoman and cyclist. Her father is the only survivg brother of the King. He was named for the Duke Wellington, and has followed a military career. He fifty-five years old. The prospective bridegroom is a utenant in the Swedish guards honor, and is in the direct line heirs to the throne. It is a rious fact that he and his future fe are closely allied to the royal mily of Germany. The Prince's other is a niece of the late Emror Frederick, the father of the esent Emperor; while the Prinss Margaret is a niece of the late mpress Frederick. The press of th countries expresses the live-st satisfaction in the arrangeent. The chief daily of Stockolm, the capital of Sweden, ys: "It can be confidently stat- that the marriage which has en arranged harmonizes most ppily with the national sympaies, which always have a preferice for the free and mighty peoe of England. The Princess is genuine English lady, with all e good qualities which are charteristic of a daughter of free lbion. Princess Margaret will sily win the hearts of both the rthern peoples." The English pers are similarly pleased, and e King says that the engageent has his "entire sanction and pproval." It is well known that has always cherished a warm gard for King Oscar, with whom has long been on terms of inmacy. The congratulations of th nations will be tendered to e royal couple, who, in the ornary course of events, will one ay occupy the throne of the rthern kingdoms. For their sakes, and still more r those of the people of those realms, we may wish r them the blessing that the hoary king invoked on e head of his son:

Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness to e king's son. He shall judge thy people in righteousness and thy or with judgment (Ps. 72: 1).

ouseholders in Peril

Excavations in West Thirty-first Street New York, make room for the new Pennsylvania terminal, have isturbed the foundations of a whole block of houses. was noticed recently that one house after another as settling, and attempts were made to shore them p. Heavy beams were placed against the walls, and n investigation was made of the cellars. It was found at all were built on a sandy foundation, and under e house a spring was found that had washed away e sand. Notices were speedily served on the tenants, arning them that their dwellings had become unsafe. hey needed no urging to quit the shaky structures, xcept in one case in which the tenant declared she had o place to go. It was no time for argument, so the olice were summoned, and she was removed by force om the quaking house. It was well that others were ore concerned for her safety than she was herself. It may be hoped that she is not delaying to secure safety for her soul, for its dwelling must soon crumble to dust:

For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (II Cor. 5: 1).

Opening a Royal Tomb in Egypt

An interesting discovery has been made in Egypt by Theodore M. Davis, the famous American explorer. He noticed that there was a heap of rough stones near the tomb of one of the Pharaohs of the dynasty subsequent to the Exodus. Believing that they concealed the entrance to an earlier tomb, he had them removed, and his suspicions were confirmed. Behind them was a door cut in the solid rock, which gave entrance to a flight of steps, at the foot of which was another door, still bearing the seals of the Pharaohs. Inside was a room thirty feet long and fifteen wide, in which were the mummies of a man and a woman. An inscription showed that they were the parents of the wife of Amenhotep III., the most famous king of the eighteenth dynasty. This was the dynasty which preceded the oppressors of Israel. It was consequently one of the earliest tombs yet opened. Beyond the coffins the ground was covered with large sealed jars of oil and wine, and shell-like boxes of wood, each of which contained a piece of cooked beef wrapped in black muslin. Planted on top of these was a chariot broad enough to hold two. This was richly plated, and incrusted with gold and leather work as fresh as when it was made. Probably the dead couple ordered, during their lives, such provision made for the need they anticipated. How many there are who know what their needs will really be, who neglect to provide for them by accepting Christ's offer.

Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day (John 6: 54).

Adulterated Food

Investigation of the food and candies sold in New York has revealed an alarming condition of affairs. It has been undertaken by the State Board of Agriculture in the hope of prevailing on the Legislature to provide funds for a systematic investigation. Two hundred samples of candy contained paraffin and glucose; catsups contained benzoic acid and cochineal; and honey contained glucose. The analyst to whom the samples were submitted, said: "While many of these foreign substances are not poisonous or a direct menace to health, they are all a violation of the law and a fraud on the purchaser, because, without exception, they are used to cheapen the product." There is reason to fear that the spiritual food dispensed to many people, is similarly adulterated. The pure Gospel misses its purpose when it is mixed with human devices.

Not with wisdom of words, lest the Cross of Christ should be made of none effect (I. Cor. 1: 17).

Scared by Mice

An experiment was tried on wild animals in the winter quarters of a circus at Bridgeport, Conn., a few days ago. The keepers collected a number of live mice, which they introduced into the cages. The first was the cage of Mohammed, a royal Bengal tiger, one of the most dreaded of the beasts in the menagerie. No sooner did the ferocious animal see the mouse than he was overcome with abject terror. He darted back to the extreme corner of the cage, and as the mouse approached him, he leaped to the front. He was so terrified that the keepers, fearing for his life, removed the mouse. The experiment was then tried on the lions, with similar results; even the largest and most intractable of the animals shrank in fear from the mouse and raced madly about their cages to avoid it. But the greatest panic occurred in the elephant house. The huge beasts were wild with fright. They trumpeted and showed the most intense distress. The mouse seemed to have no fear, but climbed on the backs of the elephants and scampered about them, driving the big brutes wild with excitement. There too, the experiment was shortened, lest the elephants tear down the house. Why the beasts should so dread the insignificant creatures, no one seems able to explain. Evidently their consciousness of power, so conspicuous generally, deserts them in the presence of a creature incapable of hurting them. If they put forth their strength, the mouse would be crushed. It is so with the Christian in his spiritual conflicts. Before the power Christ gives him, his adversary must flee.

Resist the devil and he will flee from you (James 4: 7).

BRIEF NOTES

The Lyceum Theatre of Pentre, in Wales, is closed for an indefinite time, owing to lack of patronage since the revival.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond is making a tour of Nebraska, which he visited many years ago. His best helpers now are persons who were converted then in their youth.

At the midday meeting in Park Street Church, Boston, Mass., at which Rev. J. W. Dawson preached, fifteen hundred men were present, and others tried to get in, but there was no room.

When the Bible was presented to President Roosevelt to kiss at his inauguration, it was open at James 1: 22-24. "Be ye doers of the Word and not hearers only," etc.

Rev. J. W. Dawson, preaching in Boston, Mass., recently, said, that when a student, his sister on her deathbed urged him to preach Christ. He added: "To-day, after thirty years, I declare I find nothing else but Christ worth preaching."

HER LATE REWARD

BY OWEN KILDARE

THERE are school laws and truant officers—and there are ways to circumvent the whole apparatus. Still, it would be unjust to accuse Gussie Tellner of having "beaten school" from her own volition. She had no voice in the matter.

With the advent of her seventh year, Gussie became the most important member of the Tellner household. The reason: every night the family wondered that the mother, hollow-cheeked and cough-racked, was still in the land of the living. Under these circumstances it was but natural that Gussie, the eldest, had to look after the family, including, besides parents, four other children. There had been no time or opportunity for her character to form or assert itself, and it can only be surmised whether her meekness was natural or acquired.

And Gussie was fearfully meek.

The mother—no blame to her—required constant attendance and paid lavishly in peevishness. The father, finding the meal at his homecoming not to his liking in the smallest detail, paid with sound cuffs, and the younger children, taking their cue from their elders' example, paid for many favors with vicious kicks given on the sly. Gussie never rebelled. It was her lot. So, why be dissatisfied? Besides, to all who do their duty well, a day of sweetest reckoning comes.

Fortunately, the children did not inherit any germs of the wasting disease, and by the time the mother had lain in Greenwood Cemetery for over a decade, they had grown to be robust youths—all, excepting Gussie. They seemed to be in a hurry to leave their home, and, one by one, they departed to marry and live by their own firesides. But one was left, one found no fireside to share—Gussie.

The probability that Gussie would ever depart from home to be married seemed very slim. You see, when a girl, from her seventh to her twenty-fifth year, day in and day out, has to slave for the one wage, hard indifference, the best in her has never a chance to come to the surface, and to gloss over with its mellowing sheen the minor defects neglected by busy nature. No one would ever have been so rash as to assert that Gussie was destined to be beautiful, but no one should have ever wished to see her as she was, before she received her last reward.

Her shoulders were bent, and the stoop was also noticeable in her knees, weakened by much climbing of the many stairs to the top floor; her hands were large, and especially emphasized by the swollen knuckles; the hair, a touselled mop, had lost all color; and the eyes—well, the eyes seemed always as if they said: "Please, please."

When they all were gone, and only the father and Gussie were left, she should have come into her share, but it was too late. The father, it is true, made a few attempts to make life more pleasant to her, but when one has to wait twenty-five years for kindness, one is apt not to know how to receive it. And the father just thought that Gussie was really dumb and dense. But her cooking was wonderful, and so the father bore his lot, which he endeavored to brighten by much pinochle-playing until near midnight in the saloon on the ground-floor of the tenement house. This arrangement left Gussie in sole and complete control of the premises; but it cannot be said that she appreciated her solitude.

For pastime and recreation she sat by the window, and wondered what it was that made people laugh and feel happy. Surely, she had always tried to do her duty, but she had not yet learned to laugh. Neither was she quite sure about her state of happiness.

"OH, GUSSIE, WHO'S GOING TO COOK FOR ME NOW?" HE WAILED

Such mental puzzles are not conducive to health a longevity, and, on a certain day, after cooking t finest possible dinner for her father, and scrubbing t tenement from end to end, Gussie sat down to rest, a did not think it worth while to rise again.

Her brothers were busy, but the two sisters called cheer her. "You should have married," said one.

"I guess you must be pretty tired after working as y did," said the other, and Gussie did not contradict the

"Oh, Gussie, Gussie, my daughter, what's going become of me now? Who's going to cook for now?" wailed the father; and Gussie, still bewilder by her own puzzle, could not answer his riddle.

"Well, I guess, there's nothing more can do for you," said the sisters, and we their way. The father went with them, get his cold supper from the delicatess store. Gussie, alone, thought that, aft all, it was not so bad to be sick. Th one could stay, at least, in bed.

"And I'm so tired."

She had scarcely breathed the wor before a sweet drowsiness stole over he and left her in a state in which the re and the imaginary were inseparable. Ev voices seemed to float through the ba chamber.

Hark!

"Come, and I will give you rest."

Gussie heard the whisper. She kne Whose promise it was; she knew Wh always was ready with the invitation, y she could hardly believe that she, even sh meek Gussie, would ever have this we come offered to her. No, it surely w imagination, a make-believe. MEN AND WOMEN OF THE HOUR

RIDER HAGGARD, the distinguished English novelist, has just arrived in America as Rhodes commissioner to investigate the Salvation Army farms in the West. Mr. Haggard's chief interest is in sociological subjects, and the income from his stories has been used to further his investigations. He said: "I hope to find in this country a cure for slumdom, bumdom, and rumdom."

BARON HUGO VON KAGER, is the engineer-in-chief of the new Simplon Tunnel, in the Alps. It is a triumph of modern engineering skill. The total length of the bore is twelve and a quarter miles, over three miles longer than the St. Gothard, that has held first place up to this time. Two tunnels were started from opposite sides of the mountain, and met within a few inches of each other.

ADMIRAL NEBOGATOFF is the commander of the Third Pacific Squadron, that has been sent out by the Russian government to the Far East. The Admiral has a good record as a soldier and sailor. The squadron consists of one slow ironclad, and some coast-defence vessels that were collected at Libau. It is probable that these lame ducks were sent out to give the Baltic fleet an excuse for not proceeding beyond Madagascar.

MADAME STOESSEL, the wife of the gallant defender of Port Arthur, has been called the "good angel" of the siege. While her husband spent his time in encouraging the troops and risking his life in the trenches, she was untiring in her efforts to alleviate the sufferings of the sick and wounded in the hospitals. Her coming brought sunshine to many a dispirited man, with the gloomy thoughts o one helpless, hundreds of miles from home. When Madame Stoess and her husband returned to Russia by steamer, she had under he charge a large number of orphans, who had lost their fathers du ing the siege.

Society and Mothers

SOCIETY is a term of diverse meaning. In a great country like ours, there are numerous aspects of society, and, strictly speaking, there is no single aspect which limits it to one set of people, or to one group of large wealth and exclusiveness, who claim to be leaders of fashion. They compose a portion of society, it is true, but they are not entitled to supremacy, nor are they without their ties to other groups, equally with them claiming an influential place. No sphere, perfect and unbroken, incloses, for instance, what is called the smart set, the most conspicuous members thereof having either inherited their fortunes from plain and hard-working ancestors, or having numbers of plain kinsfolk here and there, who could, if they chose, show the folly of pretension in a young and pushing Republic.

The truth is, there are as many different societies as there are sections in the Union, as many right ways of defining society as there are tints in the rainbow. Wherever men and women live in a community, there is some sort of human society. The accepted meaning of the term, as generally adopted, conveys to us the idea of people who are intelligent and refined, who partake of a high civilization, and conform to the rules which govern the well-bred.

This society may reside in a city or in a hamlet. We may find it in urban centres, or in rural villages. Sometimes it is provincial, sometimes metropolitan; but in either case, those who constitute it must have mastered the fine art of living together in peace.

In American society the mother is a regal figure. She is as much an autocrat as any queen. Mothers have the final word to say about most things. It does not matter very much in what condition they live, a mansion or a cottage, is only a throne for the mother who resides there.

Among our women of wealth there is at present great luxury of dress and equipage, and their store of jewels is lavish and magnificent. But a little woman who has only a new dress now and then, and no jewelry except her wedding ring, holds her own with the best, and if refined and educated takes as high a place socially as any others. The only place where mothers are not regnant, is where the sway of a heathen religion prevails. Even there they are loved, but in the dreary life of woman in Oriental lands, there is no opportunity for the development of the qualities which render our women influential and keep them beautiful until their latest day.

The accidents of furniture and decoration, of fashionable excess or frugal economy, do not touch the real life of the home, and do not of themselves make one woman strong in her own character, or another weak. The children of fashion are in these days very simply brought up, simplicity being at present the fashion. Few mothers fail to supervise carefully the nurses of their children. Large salaries are paid to trained nurses who take charge of little children in the homes of wealth. The first governess is a graduated kindergartner. Every step in the progress of these fortunate children is vigilantly marked, and the children are accustomed to the best food, to exercise, to fresh air, and to all that can constitute hygienic living.

You see nowhere finer specimens of beautiful infancy and robust childhood than in the nursery of the well-to-do mother. When the young people grow up, the mother is still very much to the fore; she does not slip into the background. By the time her daughters need a chaperone, she is prepared to accompany them everywhere, looking in her fair matronhood as if she were an elder sister.

No mother in society suffers a daughter to go about without proper chaperonage. A party of young people visiting any place of amusement, or going anywhere in public, are never left to themselves. A married lady must be of the party. A girl's father at times acts as escort to a group of young people, and is popular in the capacity he thus assumes. But the mother is the better chaperone. The reason for chaperonage is based on the idea that a daughter is a precious thing, to be cared for as if she were life's dearest treasure. "Life's holiest argosy," wrote a man of his eldest daughter, and most worshiped darling. Then, too, anything may happen; an accident, an unforeseen delay, something against which no forethought could provide, when people are out for a gala time, and the part of wisdom is to have some older person on the spot, who will know what to do, and whose presence will save all embarrassment.

In small towns, where many people are near of kin, or have grown up from childhood together, there is not quite the occasion for a chaperone that is evident in the society of a city, where distances are to be taken into account, and strangers are on every side. We are not yet in the conditions that prevail abroad, where misconception and peril threaten a girl who goes out by herself, but we are very far in our large towns from the homely friendliness of the early Republic.

No mother, trained in society ways, would permit the long solitary rambles and drives, the days on lake and river, and the freedom of companionship that are still allowed to young people in some parts of the country. And it is to be hoped that before very long, the mother on the farm, and in the village, and on the plantation, will assert herself sufficiently to prohibit a good deal of the liberty verging on indiscretion, which now obtains.

THE READING LESSON

Spell the words, darling; before very long,
You will read the whole page without one letter wrong.

"MISTRESS IN MY OWN HOUSE"

"I MUST be mistress in my own house," sighs a tired out woman, whose delicate body and weary nerves are sorely taxed by present-day conditions of domestic service. "My maid objects to my having company. She declines to carry a message to one of the neighbors, when I am laid aside by a headache, and cannot do my own errand. She refuses to put the best china on the table on Sunday, because it is too much trouble to take it from the shelves, and now she tells me she is to be addressed as Miss MacGlory, instead of plain Mary, as heretofore."

"I wouldn't mind the last stipulation," answers a friend, "if she would concede the other points."

"Well, then, I do. I will not yield to the folly of calling my maid Miss, when I have always used her Christian name. So far as I can see, there is no help for me, Jenny, I must either do my own work or board, and John hates boarding."

The truth is that a good many housekeepers are just now in the precise situation of a driver with a runaway team. They still sit on the box and hold the reins, but the horses are in full career, and the only hope is that they will keep the middle of the road until they are worn out, or somebody stops them. Between the absurdities of the women who are trying to arrange housework by railway schedule, and to elevate domestic service by sentimentality, and the ignorance of the women who are living out, and who do not understand the fuss made on their account, the housekeeper falls between two stools.

In justice all around, it must be admitted that many an otherwise sensible and fair-minded woman exacts too much from the younger woman whom she has hired to work in her kitchen. She asks more than flesh and blood can perform. Hired girls are not machines. They are human, and our sisters. No woman is fit to keep house who does not remember this and act accordingly.

Unequal Marriages

The other day the newspapers reported the elopement of a rich man's daughter with her father's coachman. The latter may be a worthy fellow, but he did an unworthy thing when he persuaded a silly girl to evade her parents, leave a good home, and run away with him. In all probability he will reap the reward of his folly in days to come, since a wife not of his social degree, will not very successfully fit into the duties of her position. So far as the man is concerned, if he have force and energy, he may triumph over the disadvantages of his earlier days, but he is taking a great risk in handicapping himself with a scatter-brained girl, who begins her married life by treating her parents with scorn and making her father's house a by-word among the neighbors.

Unequal marriages, whether the inequality be of birth, of education, or of creed, seldom turn out fortunately. They are apt, when the first roseate glow is over, to become disillusionizing experiences. The foundation of success in marriage is reciprocal esteem and unsoiled ideals. When honor is stabbed beforehand, joy will be shy of taking up an abode with two persons who have forgotten that marriage is a sacrament and home a sanctuary.

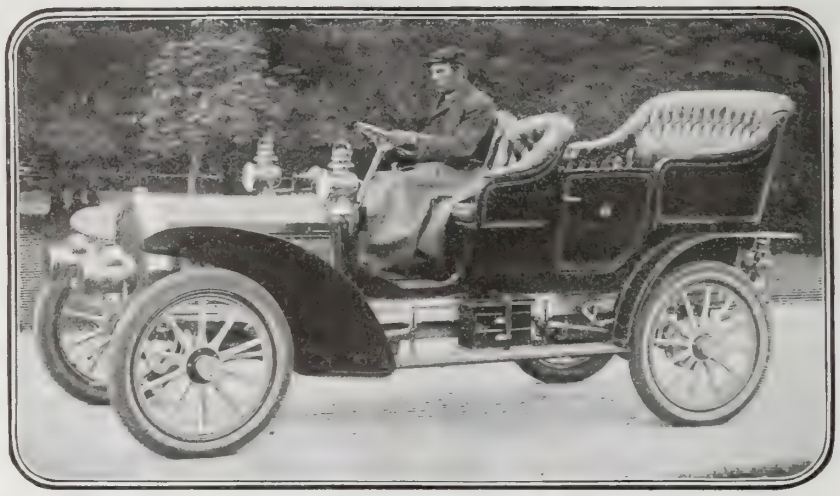
THE AUTOMOBILE IN AMERICAN LIFE

OLDSMOBILE RUNABOUT



THE PACKARD TOURING CAR

THE WHITE TOURING CAR

IF you want to feel the sensation of flying without wings, to feel the fresh air driven into your lungs, and every artery pulsating with new life—the real joy of living—get an automobile. The auto has ceased to be the plaything for the rich only. It has become a thing of practical utility and pleasure for the man of moderate means. It is indeed a small place where the local physician or man of business does not use a light runabout for his daily trips.

The automobile, in the first place, is much safer than any horse that was ever driven. It is true that it did not make that reputation during the early years of its existence, but it is true to-day. It has no temper, except that of its driver, and he can usually agree with himself. It has no whims to be coddled, nor must one get out and hold its head at country crossings when the "iron horse" goes by. While one is getting the exhilarating pleasure of a quick dash on a good road, he has at the same time more control over his vehicle than he would have over an old horse that is likely to become suddenly youthful when you are trying to get him by another team, with a steep bank on one side and a ten foot gully on the other.

To the business man living in the suburbs, the automobile has become indispensable, and he would no sooner think of giving it up than he would his business itself. Probably no one thing has contributed to the present trend of the city dweller to seek not only the suburbs for a home, but even the country itself, as the automobile. The machines of the present day are all built on comparatively simple lines, so that a man, with a little instruction, can be his own mechanic and do his own repairing on the road. A certain machine was built in the early days of the horseless carriage. It had twenty-six cranks! Two and three are to-day a fair average. Could there be anything stronger or simpler in construction than the Oldsmobile runabout? Everything is within easy reach of the driver, and the start is made from the seat. This is one of the most perfect of the light cars, and it could be no better if it cost $6,500, instead of $650. It has held its own in this particular line for the last five years. At one filling it is good for a hundred miles of road, and it can be speeded up to twenty-five miles an hour, with no danger to car or occupant. It is built for general use about town, and, although not posing as a touring car, it has gone every place that a touring car has gone, and last year it won the great hill climbing contest at Mt. Washington, in New Hampshire. The machine was in as good order at the top as when it started, and the owner used it for his long homeward journey. This brings up another advantage of the horseless carriage. You do not have to worry over the size of every hill on the road, for fear that your horse will have a bad case of the heaves before your journey's end; neither do you have to stop to let him recuperate after every bad stretch of road. You can turn on the crank with a clear conscience, and the automatic horse gets there at good speed.

THE OLDSMOBILE TOURING CAR

The automobile has settled down to certain specified forms, and we see little of the freak cars of a few years ago. Starting with the light runabout for general town and country use, there comes next the light touring car built for two persons. Some have a seat to let down in front, to accommodate two more. This car will go any place the larger touring cars will go, perhaps more. It can turn on any country road to which a horse and buggy can be driven. Next, we have the regular touring Tonneau, with seats for four people. Fitted with large baskets at the sides, it becomes the owner's traveling hotel. In it, he roams the country at will, seeking the most beautiful and picturesque spots that are always just away from the railroads, and, were it not for the automobile, would be seldom visited. Further up the list, we find the touring cars that seat five and six. About the largest car made is the one pictured on the cover of this week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the famous "rubber-neck car," as the New Yorkers call it. It holds about forty-six people, and is used for personally-conducted tours about New York City. It is always an interesting sight, even to the regular inhabitant of the town of sky-scrapers, and he seldom fails to turn and watch it pass with its jolly crowd of passengers. Most of the large parks in the cities have now a regular line of auto-busses, that run trips to the various points of interest.

Of the large touring cars, the Royal has taken one of the prominent places in the popular mind. Probably no little of its vogue comes from the record it made last summer on the famous endurance run to the Exposition at St. Louis. The story has been published in full, and it makes interesting reading. The Royal has been built to combine speed, simplicity of parts and endurance. It won a first-class certificate for its remarkable run, and the owner of a Royal, it is claimed, can be told by the smile of supreme satisfaction that is visible under the lower edge of his green goggles. The Royal seats five and six persons, and is built especially with the idea of filling all requirements for a long distance touring car, as well as for ordinary pleasure excursions. Despite its size it is an exceedingly graceful and handsome machine, and its dark green body has been seen in every country where they have roads that an automobilist can use, and even some that would appear dubious with the ordinary horse and wagon. The American makers have been fully as progressive as those of France, the great country until recently of the automobile. It has been the idea with some of the ultra-rich that a car to be good must be bought abroad. The falsity of this idea has been proved by many a long run that has been won by an American built machine, while the chaffeur and the owner of the foreign-built car have spent part of the time lying on their backs in the road, gazing up into the works of their vehicle, wondering why the wheels would not go round. America in this branch of industry has taken the foremost place, as she has in so many other lines of commercial enterprise. Such automobiles as the Winton, Olds, Royal, Cadillac, Reo, Locomobile, Peerless, Pope, Franklin, Auto-car, Packard, White, and Studebaker, cannot be exceeded in efficiency by an imported car.

American makers have not yet invaded the European market with their productions to any extent, but a great many parts have been copied by the foreign makers. American inventions have been first recognized by enterprising foreign manufacturers, and then reproduced here.

he motor carriage, and he has covered nearly the en- ire surface of the globe in his wanderings. His car is really his home on wheels. The American continent has been crossed several times by agents for manufac- turers, and by private owners. When a man gets the habit of traveling around the earth in an automobile, it seems impossible to cure him. He is always looking for new roads to conquer, and it is the ambition of his life to be the first to ride into some city in a half-civilized land, or to cross some range of lofty mountains. The world has already been so well covered by the motor car, that the man who now wishes to make a fleeting reputation in this line, and have his picture published in the newspapers, has got to do it within a short time.

In Europe, the automobile has been pushed to the front in many ways that could well be copied here. The fire departments of a number of foreign cities are provided with auto-engines, and auto-hook-and-ladder trucks. This is a distinct advance on the American system of rushing heavy horses at top speed to a fire, dragging a truck weighing several tons. It has also made a place for itself in the armies of the Old World—Germany, France, and Great Britain taking the lead. The idea was quickly adopted in this country, and the automobile has been given an extensive trial as a means of conveyance for the signal corps.

One great fact of interest to all people who are, or expect to be, owners of an automobile, is the cheap cost of running, and there is little truth in the common joke about the amount of money spent for parts. The ordinary machine with a gasolene motor, costs less than a cent a mile to run, and the ordinary tires will last on the average, four thousand miles without repair. There is no other means of transport that can show anywhere like an equal record. The West has taken hold of the auto for many purposes, and it can be seen on some of the large farms as an actual part of the farm equipment for visiting various fields, and for the numberless errands necessary in a day's work on one of these great agricultural establishments. It will probably never entirely displace the horse for pleasure riding, but it may in a business way. It will be bought by thousands of people in moderate circumstances, who could never afford the prancing steed of flesh and bone that eats up its own price several times in a year or two.

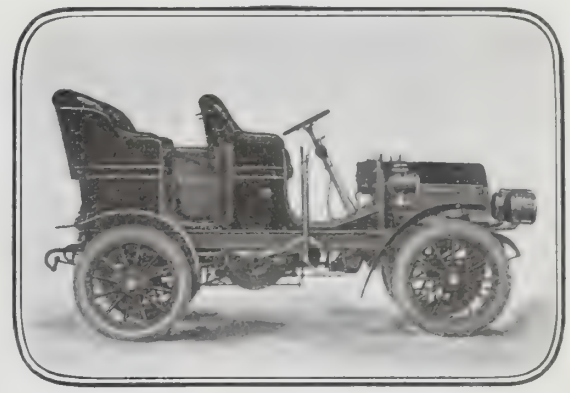
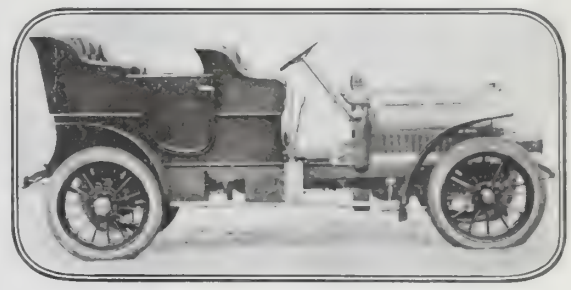
The farmers at first, in some localities, had a prejudice against the automobile that arose doubtless from having a few chickens decapitated by some scorching machine, or their horses frightened by a reckless chauffeur. This prejudice has about disappeared. The man who has driven an automobile to any extent can usually be relied on to be careful of the rights of the horse, and we hear of few accidents. The automobile has been a great friend to the farmer in the impetus given by it to the good roads movement. No other one thing has done as much. The various automobile associations have got together in their States, and forced legislation for good roads that could have been accomplished by no other body of men. There is still much to be done in this line for the relief of the agricultural communities, even in the wealthy Empire State. As an example, the road which runs from Albany to Utica, through the beautiful Mohawk valley, has some of the worst stretches that can be found on any highway in the country. The farmers and automobile enthusiasts have got together in many parts of the country to work for their common interests, and there is little prospect that the freak legislation that arose from ungrounded prejudice, will be repeated in the future. A recent writer on the automobile states that it will mean the salvation of the small, country storekeeper, whose business is at present threatened by the large mail-order houses in the cities. More people will go to the country to make their permanent home, and the country storekeeper will benefit accordingly. This has already happened in some districts. The terrors of isolation in the country have begun to vanish for city people, when neighbors twenty-five miles away can be reached in about three-quarters of an hour.



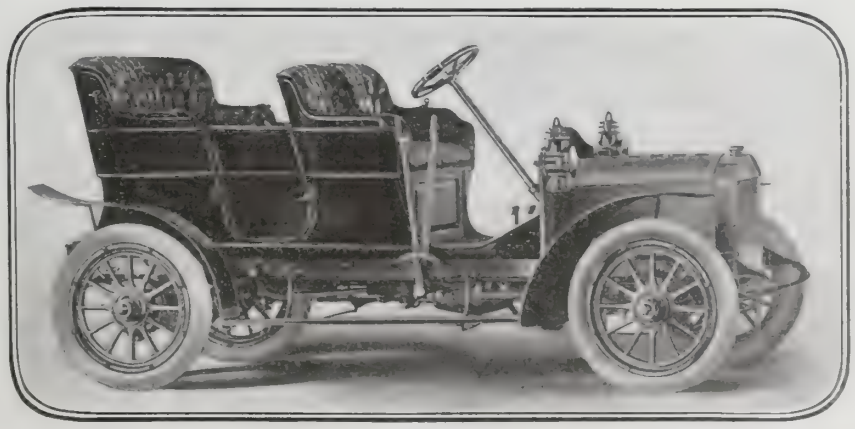
THE STUDEBAKER, MODEL 9502



THE ROYAL TOURING CAR

The greatest boon of the horseless wagon, with the exception of its contribution to pleasure, has been in placing a cheap delivery wagon within the reach of the small dealer. For firms that have a suburban trade, or for the dealer in a small town, the car is bound to be indispensable. It is the ideal delivery wagon, and snow or slush, rain or shine, makes no difference with its ability to get there. Of course a blizzard will lay it up, but under ordinary circumstances it will do all that can possibly be required of it. Many large trucking firms have adopted the auto-truck, and it is merely a forerunner of the day when all of the transportation about our cities will be done by this type of vehicle. In the Middle States, the electric express wagon has become very popular. At the present time gasolene is in the lead for furnishing motive power, electricity second, and steam third. The electric car is very easy to manage, but has the great drawback of being dependent on a charging station.

In closing, it should be said that the prices of good cars have been slowly decreasing, and will undoubtedly continue to do so for some time to come.



THE TWENTY HORSE-POWER AUTO-CAR FOR LONG TRIPS

JESUS GIVES LIFE AFTER DEATH

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

LAZARUS says: "I was suddenly stricken down with fever

A voice as of an angel spake to me:
'Thy time is come, prepare to meet thy God.'
'Twas gently spoken, yet a sudden chill
Struck to my heart; for I was scarcely more
Than midway on life's pathway, nor had thought
For long years to lay down my pilgrim's staff.
I felt that one was standing by me, whom
I saw not, and with trembling lips replied,
Thou called'st me, O Lord, and here am I."

I. Life After Physical Death. The writer, conducting the funeral of a young man whose parents, sisters and friends were present, grouped three texts for comfort and hope. Turning to the friends he said, "Our friend sleepeth." Turning to the parents he said, "Thy son liveth." Turning to the sisters he said, "Thy brother shall rise again." Such are the lights which Christianity casts. Not only life but family relationship and deathless love are to continue: "Thy brother shall rise again." A few weeks ago a teacher used as illustration for the lesson on the nobleman's son, the story of the Christian soldier of the Civil War who was killed, and his Bible, with the words "Thy son liveth," ringed with his blood, was sent home as a comforting message to his parents. The teacher improved the story by making the dying soldier himself mark the passage with his blood, and consign it by a comrade's hand to his parents, by way of assuring them he would still live in spite of death in another world. "How did he know?" said a young New England sceptic of seven years, in the class. And the teacher, fresh from a famous woman's college could only answer feebly, "If he believed in immortality at all, that would be the time he would believe it most strongly." She could have done better with a problem in algebra. Could you, my reader, do better for child or man, for the living or the dying, in answering that supreme question? The Gospel was given in part to provide a better answer.

That is why Jesus raised the daughter of Jairus from her bed, and the son of the widow of Nain from his bier, and Lazarus after four days in the grave—all this to prove that death does not end all. Even earthly life may be restored by the divine Lifegiver. But Christ's own resurrection, proved by the world-wide spread of Christianity, not otherwise to be accounted for, is a fuller assurance of immortality; for his resurrection life unlike the three human resurrections above named, was never followed by death, but his physical body became a spiritual body and rose to heaven. The very garden where he rose in this month of April, twenty centuries ago, was full of strengthening analogies, the resurrection of dead seeds in living flowers, of winter itself in the quickened life of spring.

The infidel Countess of Hanover, ordered that her tomb should be made of heavy blocks of granite and inscribed, "This tomb shall remain undisturbed throughout eternity." But God's mighty frosts separated the stones, and into the crevice his winds blew the dust, and then an acorn fell there and grew into a tree that lifted out of its place the very slab that bore the defiant inscription. So truth triumphs over error, and life over death. It will help us to realize immortality, to keep ever in the mind the fact that soul and body are as organist and organ, as tenant and house.

When John Quincy Adams was eighty years old, he met in the streets of Boston an old friend, who shook his trembling hand, and said: "Good morning! And how is John Quincy Adams to-day?" "Thank you," was the ex-President's answer, "John Quincy Adams himself is well, sir; quite well, I thank you. But the house in which he lives at present is becoming dilapidated. It is tottering upon its foundation. Time and the seasons have nearly destroyed it. Its roof is pretty well worn out. Its walls are much shattered, and it trembles with every wind. The old tenement is becoming almost uninhabitable, and I think John Quincy Adams will have to move out soon; but he himself is quite well, sir; quite well." "And if this earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And in the winds from unsunned spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of far darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown.

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love Divine, O Helper ever present,
Be thou my strength and stay.—WHITTIER.

The supreme proof of immortality is that Jesus promised it. There is nothing more rational than to believe what he said who was "the purest among the mighty, and the mightiest among the pure." And he not only said it, he showed it to men's eyes in bringing back to earth Moses and Elijah, at his coronation.

II. Life After Moral Death. "Chaplain McCabe," as we still like to call him, though now a bishop, gives a new illustration of God's power to resurrect those as dead spiritually, as Lazarus was physically, dead to the stinking point in their shameful immorality. In a town of Paraguay lived an Indian named Bogado. If any one had asked there, "Who is the most wretched drunkard in town?" all would have answered, "Bogado." If it had been asked, "Who is the biggest liar?" again the answer would have been, "Bogado." "One day Bogado found a leaf—a single leaf—of the New Testament. He read it; it charmed his soul. 'The word of God is quick and powerful.' He took it to the Roman priest. The priest tore it up and stamped it beneath his feet. Bogado's curiosity was excited. He never rested till he owned a copy of the New Testament, of the dying love of Jesus. He stopped drinking, stopped swearing, stopped lying. The expression of his face was one of joy unspeakable and full of glory. Bogado was converted, pardoned, regenerated, saved, and started on the march for heaven. He is now a local preacher and has services in his own house." That is a greater resurrection than the raising of Lazarus by so much as soul is more than body, and character more than flesh.

Yet another moral resurrection may be introduced here—a saved murderess. She made her living as a professional murderess of children—babies. Mr. Torrey, the evangelist, relates the story: "The third time he talked to this woman, the spirit of God got her under conviction as soon as we went out. She came back in a few days, and she said, 'Oh, you can talk to me if you please. Do you know what I did after I went out of your meeting? I went home, and I prayed to the devil to take my conviction of sin away. You may believe me, I prayed to the devil himself, and he has done it.' Truly a hopeless case, was it not? But God is able to save the most hopeless sinner. I just kept on praying and talking, and God gave me the joy of bringing that woman to Christ, Not very long after, in my Bible class, I led her to Christ. It is a Bible class made up of every sort under heaven. The next Sunday, among those wh rose to say they had become Christians, was a man wh got up at the back of the house. The woman who ha had the face of a demon before, came to me with th face of an angel, and she said, 'Mr. Torrey, I brough that man here. I was going to the class, and I saw tha man on the corner, and I thought I'd do something fo Christ. I brought him here, and he is saved; and' sh said, 'now I'm so happy!'"

Not only individuals but churches, often need mora resurrections, and this story of Lazarus was onc used with good effect to that end. The pastor's hear was greatly burdened by the indifference of his Church t spiritual things, and so he preached tenderly on the text "Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick." He showed the grea love of Christ for the Church, pictured so vividly in th Bible in the love of bridegroom and bride. Then h showed how sickly was the Church he served. The sermo created favorable comment, for the figures were unusuall well developed. But there was no moral or spiritua improvement. And so he preached the next Sunday a brave and searching sermon on the test, "I tell you plainly, Lazarus is dead." He showed how like to th inaction of death was the lethargy of the Church. This was also praised as a timely sermon, but there was no spiritual life aroused. The pastor therefore, with increasing intensity preached on the text, "By this time he stinketh." He showed how odious and odorous to God and man is hypocrisy, great professions unfulfilled. This time dead consciences responded to the lance of faithful preaching, and a revival was already beginning when he preached the next Sunday on the text, "Loose him and let him go;" pointing out the hindrances that must be cut away in business, and politics, and pleasures, in order that the Church of God might go forth in life and liberty to its God-given mission of blessing in the world.

III. The sympathy of Christ. This lesson, in the shortest verse of the Bible, "Jesus wept," gives almost the tenderest picture of his sympathy for the sorrowing, which went out even more to the sinful. An evangelist tells the following story to show the power of tears for the sinful:

"I went out one night from Chicago to one of our suburbs. When I gave out the invitation for anybody to accept Christ, the first man to do so was away down in the further end of the building. After he had come up to the altar, I sat down and commenced to talk to him. He said, 'I'll tell you why I'm here to-night, and why I have accepted Christ. I have been a church attendant for years. When a preacher was preaching, I took out my note-book and compared his sermon with his life during the week. I'd go to prayer meetings with a note-book, and write down what people said in prayer meeting, and then compare it with their life during the week. About a year ago I was taken sick, and I went down lower and lower, until finally the physician said I'd have to die. I was not disturbed. I had been finding fault with hypocritical church members so long that I thought I was as good as anybody. But as I lay there—as I thought—dying, a man who had been in the ministry came in to see me, and asked me if he might pray with me. I said, 'Yes, if you will enjoy it, I have no objections to your doing so.' But I was not worrying. I thought, 'I'll keep a check on this prayer; I'll see if he is real.' As I watched him praying there, by-and-bye a tear commenced to steal down his face, and I said to myself, 'Here's a man whom I have never spoken to in my life, who has no reason to have any interest in me, and he is weeping for me.' That broke my heart. That's why I'm here to-night, that's why I have taken Christ."

There is nothing in this world will win sinners like a passionate love. You may be great at argument, but if you are not great at loving people, you will never accomplish very much. It is love that wins.

IV. Christ in the Home. The supreme lesson of Bethany is, the blessedness of having Christ in the home in joy and sorrow.

Our home, what shall it be?
Like lovely Bethany,
A place where Christ doth come:
The wife, like Mary, sitting at the Saviour's feet,
"He whom thou lovest, Lord," the husband's title sweet—
Such be our home.—W. F. C.

CANARY ISLAND MOUNTAINEERS COMING TO MARKET

Gospel Labor in the Canary Islands

A MILK-SELLER

FIVE years of arduous and devoted work in the Canary Islands, that group of islands off the coast of Africa, which are sunk in the darkness of superstition and ignorance, are beginning to bear fruit. Mr. and Mrs. Macknight, who have given themselves with beautiful consecration to this apparently hopeless field, speak hopefully of the results of their labors, while recognizing clearly the difficulties which must be encountered. Individuals have been won, but the Roman Catholic priesthood exercises so strong a control over the people that few dare avow their belief. The Bible itself is the means on which they rely, and here, as everywhere else, the Word of the Lord is exerting its power. Mr. Macknight has also prepared a series of works which are becoming popular in the Islands, and in all these the spirit of the Christian teacher is manifested. One of these is on kindness to animals and stories for children, which have been accepted by the Minister of Education for use in the schools. Another excellent work, useful to missionaries and others, is Food for the Tropics, in which Mr. Macknight shows that the productions of tropical lands are better even for Americans and Europeans who live there, than the imported foods to which they are accustomed.

We regret to learn that an attack of fever has compelled these devoted missionaries to return to their native land for a year's rest and recuperation. They have given to this Gospel work in the far-off land, not only their labor, but their own income. They are deeply concerned about the continuance of the mission, to which they have given so much time and effort. They are trusting God to bless the circulation of his Word during their absence, and are hoping to find on their return many new converts to the truth.

In a letter just received Mr. Macknight says: "Many of these Spanish people follow us, believing the message. We have gone among them all over the islands of Canary and Teneriffe; we have had glad testimony from some, and two happy deaths.

"Our experience is that the country is so completely under bondage to the Roman Catholic religion, that both rich and poor, young and old, dare not and cannot leave it, except perhaps in holding a personal and secret faith in Jesus. A few photos are inclosed of the people of the country. The roads are rough, as are the people. Still we distribute Gospels among the people and visit the towns and villages, and always meet with some who secretly believe.

"A workingman of Fuerteventura, one of the Islands, is now a helper. Four years he has diligently read the Testament with us and at home, visiting us annually. He truly receives the Gospel, and has no doubt lighted a light in his island. Now he being with us, goes out with twelve Gospels daily to sell in distant villages.

MR. AND MRS. MACKNIGHT

"We journeyed forty miles lately, distributing nearly two hundred Testaments and Gospels and even little hymns and prayers. The simple people, the lovely sunshine, clear, fresh, bright air, the walks up and down among huts, the townspeople, were most delightful. We incur the fury of the priest, who shook his fist in our face, saying, 'I know you are propaganding prohibited books, and I should like to cut off your head.' The simple behavior of our native Benito, and the joy of speaking of Christ and reading a text, all these speak to us of a joy celestial and mercies given, which are divine.

"Our hearts are full of pity and prayer for these sad beings who do not realize their idolatry, nor dare to say a word. But we have had the joy of presenting the Word of God to many."

Factorymen, printers, farmers, country merchants and others, whose changing duties require very frequent washing of hands, will find that Ivory Soap is just what they want. It lathers quickly and will not make the hands sore or rough, even when used very often, or with a stiff brush. It keeps the skin soft because it is pure; as pure as a soap can be made. It floats.

President Roosevelt Talks to Mothers

Leading Thoughts From his Address Before the Mothers' Congress, Washington, March 13

FAR more important than the question of the occupation of our citizens, is the question of how their family life is conducted. No matter what that occupation may be, as long as there is a real home, and as long as those who make up that home do their duty to one another, to their neighbors and to the State, it is of minor consequence whether the man's trade is plied in the country or the city, whether it calls for the work of the hands or for the work of the head. But the nation is in a bad way if there is no real home; if the family is not of the right kind; if the man is not a good husband and father; if he is brutal, or cowardly, or selfish; if the woman has lost her sense of duty; if she is sunk in vapid self-indulgence, or has let her nature be twisted so that she prefers a sterile pseudo-intellectuality to that great and beautiful development of character which comes only to those whose lives know the fulness of duty done, of effort made, and self-sacrifice undergone.

In the last analysis the welfare of the State depends absolutely upon whether or not the average family, the average man and woman, and their children, represent the kind of citizenship fit for the foundation of a great nation, and if we fail to appreciate this, we fail to appreciate the root morality upon which all healthy civilization is based.

No piled up wealth, no splendor of material growth, no brilliance of artistic development, will permanently avail any people unless its home life is healthy, unless the average man possesses honesty, courage, common sense, and decency; unless he works hard and is willing at need to fight hard; and unless the average woman is a good wife, a good mother, able and willing to perform the first and greatest duty of womanhood; able and willing to bear and to bring up as they should be brought up, healthy children, sound in body, mind and character, and numerous enough so that the race shall increase and not decrease.

The primary duty of the husband is to be the homemaker, the bread-winner for his wife and children, and the primary duty of the woman is to be the helpmeet, the housewife and mother. The woman should have ample educational advantages, but save in exceptional cases the man must be, and she need not be, and generally ought not to be, trained for a lifelong career as the family bread-winner, and, therefore, after a certain point, the training of the two must normally be different, because the duties of the two are normally different. On the whole, I think the duty of the woman the more important, the more difficult, and the more honorable of the two; on the whole I respect the woman who does her duty even more than I respect the man who does his.

No ordinary work done by a man is either as hard or as responsible as the work of a woman who is bringing up a family of small children, for upon her time and strength demands are made not only every hour of the day, but often every hour of the night. She may have to get up night after night to take care of a sick child, and yet must by day continue to do all her household duties as well, and if the family means are scant, she must usually enjoy even her rare holidays, taking her whole brood of children with her. The birth pangs make all men the debtors of all women. Above all, our sympathy and regard are due to the struggling wives among those whom Abraham Lincoln called the plain people, and whom he so loved and trusted, for the lives of these women are often led on the lonely heights of quiet, self-sacrificing heroism.

I do not in the least believe in the patient Griselda type of woman, in the woman who submits to gross and long continued ill-treatment, any more than I believe in a man who tamely submits to wrongful aggression. No wrongdoing is so abhorrent as wrongdoing by a man toward the wife and the children who should arouse every tender feeling in his nature. I believe in the woman's keeping her self-respect just as I believe in the man's doing so. I believe in her rights just as much as I believe in the man's, and indeed a little more; and I regard marriage as a partnership in which each partner is in honor, bound to think of the rights of the other, as well as of his or her own. But I think that the duties are even more important than the rights; and in the long run the reward is ampler and greater for duty well done, than for the insistence upon individual rights, necessary though this, too, must often be. Your duty is hard, your responsibility great; but greatest of all is your reward. I do not pity you in the least. On the contrary, I feel respect and admiration for you.

Teach boys and girls alike that they are not to look forward to lives spent in avoiding difficulties, but to lives spent in overcoming difficulties. Teach them that work for themselves and also for others, is not a curse, but a blessing; seek to make them happy, to make them enjoy life, but seek also to make them face life with the steadfast resolution to wrest success from labor and adversity, and to do their whole duty before God and to man. Surely, she who can thus train her sons and daughters, is thrice fortunate among women.

There are many good people who are denied the supreme blessing of children, and for those we have the respect and sympathy always due to those who, from no fault of their own, are denied any of the other great blessings of life. But the man or woman who deliberately foregoes these blessings, whether from viciousness, coldness, shallow heartedness, self-indulgence, or mere failure to appreciate aright the difference between the all-important and the unimportant—why, such a creature merits contempt as hearty as any visited upon the soldier who runs away in battle, or upon the man who refuses to work for the support of those dependent upon him, and who, though able-bodied, is yet content to eat in idleness the bread which others provide.

To sum up, then, the whole matter is simple enough. If either a race or an individual prefers the pleasures of mere effortless ease, of self-indulgence, to the infinitely deeper, the infinitely higher pleasures that come to those who know the toil and the weariness, but also the joy of hard duty well done, why, that race or that individual must inevitably in the end, pay the penalty of leading a life both vapid and ignoble. No man and no woman really worthy of the name, can care for the life spent solely or chiefly in the avoidance of risk and trouble and labor. Save in exceptional cases, the prizes worth having in life must be paid for, and the life worth living must be a life of work for a worthy end, and ordinarily of work more for others than for one's self.

The woman's task is not easy—no task worth doing is easy—but in doing it, and when she has done it, there shall come to her the highest and holiest joy known to mankind; and having done it, she shall have the reward prophesied in Scripture; for her husband and her children, yes, and all people who realize that her work lies at the foundation of all national happiness and greatness, shall rise up and call her blessed.

Is the "SIMPLE LIFE" Possible Here?

greatness is practically synonymous with simplicity in its true sense. It is a life that is plain and unadorned; that is sincere and true; and so is opposed to artifice, duplicity and insincerity.

Why cannot such a life as this be lived in America? The Simple Life is not a life of inglorious ease, of indifference to duty, of opposition to progress and of inattention to worthy ambition. Of course such a life can be lived in America. The greater illustration of the harmonious union of simplicity with strenuosity is the life of our divine Lord and Master. In proportion as we imitate his example and live over again his divine, human life, we shall show the world the highest form of the Simple Life in the midst of the utmost strenuosity, in serving God and helping men.

R. S. MacArthur

Calvary Study, New York City.

"The Simple Life Exemplified at Our Nation's Capital"

To my mind, Pastor Wagner's statement that at the bottom of our national life is great simplicity, is true.

For nearly eighteen years I have lived in the official life of Washington and, therefore, am more intimately acquainted with conditions here than anywhere else. Notwithstanding a popular belief to the contrary, somewhat vulgarly expressed in the saying that a "Public office is a private snap," I think it is but due to the government employees to say that they lead simple lives, if for no other reason than that their salaries will not permit them to do otherwise. Many government officials—Cabinet Officers, Federal Judges, Senators, Representatives, and some others—are poor men.

In our city life, the froth and fever of society, the stress and strain of competition in business, the flutterings of the gaudy butterflies of the upper crust, as well as the lower scum, the machinations of the "grafter," the "boodler" and the "ward heeler"—these and many other conditions of cities, rather blind us to the fact that underneath all the surface seething are the deep, calm water of our national home life, where are still taught those great truths, which in times of trouble and turmoil for the country at large, bring it out "safe and sound."

Edw. T. Nelson

Secretary Inter-State Commerce Commission.

"Possible for Both Rich and Poor, and Can be Lived Anywhere"

The Simple Life as outlined by Mr. Wagner can be lived anywhere. It is possible for the rich and poor. And yet I must confess that if Mr. Wagner would recognize more than he does, Christ as Saviour from sin, and the Scriptures as the rule of faith and life, the Simple Life which he advocates would be more practical. It has been asserted that Mr. Wagner completely ignores the vicarious atonement of Christ. Not having read all his books, I cannot speak intelligently, but I hope that this charge is not true.

A. C. DIXON, D.D.,

Pastor Ruggles St. Baptist Ch., Boston.

"It May be Lived in the Rich Man's Palace or the Poor Man's Cottage"

Yes; emphatically yes. It is possible to live the Simple Life in the rich man's home as well as in the poor man's cottage. To hear some people talk, one would suppose that to have a carpet upon the floor, electric lights in the hallway, or a piano in the parlor, is a sin, a flagrant sin against the Simple Life; while, on the other hand, to have coarse woolen garments, coarse food and unpictured walls, is to be a disciple of the Simple Life. Yet the poor man, in his dirty hovel, may be more a transgressor of the Simple Life than the rich man in his palace.

I enter the home of a rich, Christian merchant. What do I find? Every adornment of that home is simple. The pictures make us love the flowers, the birds and the "Man with the Hoe." When we enter the dining-room, we find simple food and high thinking. That is the Simple Life in the rich man's home. It is to love God and to love all of God's beautiful creations, and to live for the highest purposes for which man was created. That is, I say again, the Simple Life in a mansion.

I may go, on the other hand, into a poor man's home, and find dirt on the floor. I find the beds unmade. I may find there the family starving during the week, yet having ice-cream and chicken patties on Sunday, because the weekly wages were paid Saturday night. And there I may find in the morning, mothers and the daughters looking like "human frights," in soiled calico dresses, caught together with pins, and in offensive curl-papers; yet going to the theatre or to church with a ten dollar feather in a balloon-like hat, which is a cemetery for dead birds and a drygood's emporium for all kinds of ribbons. That is the example of warring against the Simple Life in a poor man's cottage. In other words, according to Channing's Symphony, you can live the Simple Life in a palace or a hut. The Simple Life is to do and to be as Christ would do and be if he were living in your place.

Frank De Witt Talmage

Los Angeles, Calif.

"It is the Sincere Life, Freed from All Sham"

The Simple Life is the sincere life, freed from all sham. This is more than the ordinary idea of simplicity, and more capable of application to all classes of society and to every life. It can and should enter every part of American life. But too much has been made of it. There is more to life. There is a higher life. The most difficult phases in life it has no relation to—suffering and sorrow, etc. It is only a fragment of the truth. For the Gospel we must go to another. Christ is practically left out of the book. The heart is still after him and his Word.

Cortland Myers.

Pastor, Baptist Temple, Brooklyn.

"The Bane of Our Time is the Tendency to Spend too Much"

It seems to me that the publication of The Simple Life has been an immense blessing to our people. It has helped to call attention to conditions which are entirely possible, but from which many of us are drifting. It will help to emphasize, in the minds of many, the possibility of living simply, and at the same time, satisfactorily. The bane of our time is the tendency to spend too much. It leads to all manner of excesses. This book has called many back to the privilege and possibility of plain living and high thinking. We owe the genial French pastor a great debt for the service which he has rendered us.

Amory H. Bradford

Pastor First Cong. Ch., Montclair, N. J.

"For Many of Us, the Simple Life is the Difficult Life"

The book, The Simple Life, I read two years ago, and when I had finished the last chapter, I was of the opinion that had the author had a larger command of the language he would have called the book "The Difficult Life." It appears to be that to me it is not a question of environment; it is a question of one's adapting himself personally to the general principles of genuine life.

I believe it is possible to live the life outlined by Mr. Wagner, whether it be called the "Simple Life" or the "Difficult Life." For many of us, the Simple Life is the difficult life.

Beautify Your Home

"YOU CAN DO IT YOURSELF"

"Then why should you allow a single piece of your furniture to remain scratched or marred when at a trifling outlay you can make it look new, elegant and stylish? Let me tell you how I do it." "With 'AD-EL-ITE' Paint and Varnish Remover I instantly remove varnish shellac, wax, stains, or paint from my furniture, woodwork and floors, without injuring my hands or the finest woods or veneers in the least. I allow the Varnish Remover to stand about three minutes until it raises the varnish and then I wipe the old varnish off clean to the wood with a rag or cotton waste. As soon as the surface is dry I apply AD-EL-ITE One-Coat Dull Finish, which dries very quickly, and in less than two hours' time I have transformed an unsightly piece of furniture into a useful article, finished in the latest approved style. The Popular Mission Finish. AD-EL-ITE One Coat Dull Finishes are made in eight beautiful shades, of which I can take my choice; Black and Brown Flemish Oak, Colonial Oak, Light, Medium and Dark Weathered Oak, Bog Oak, and Natural Oak. These are the artistic, soft, velvety dull finishes, which are now being so extensively used for Dining Rooms, Libraries, Halls, Furniture, and all Interior Woodwork. They may be applied to either hard or soft wood, and require but one coat to make a permanent and beautiful finish."

Beautify Your Home. $5.00 worth of AD-EL-ITE preparations will beautify your home surroundings more than $50.00 spent in new furniture and painters' work.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

William R. Quillan, Spencer, N. C. 1. Is heaven a place? 2. Shall we recognize our friends there? 3. Will the same body that we bury be raised at the resurrection?

1. John's description in Revelation implies that heaven is a place. 2. We have not received any special information on the subject. The only ground for opinion is that of inference. We imagine that our faculties of perception will increase rather than be diminished in power in the Spirit life. David seems to have expected to recognize his child (II. Samuel 12: 23). Dives recognized Lazarus (Luke 16: 23). 3. Paul appears to have believed that a new body would be given, and not that the identical body that was buried would be raised (see I. Cor. 15: 36-44).

T. A., South Branch, N. J. I have heard that the 4th of March, the inauguration day of our Presidents, came once in 99 or 100 years on Sunday. Is this correct?

We find by McIntyre's 250-Year Calendar, that since the inauguration of Washington in 1789, which took place on April 30, the 4th of March has fallen on Sunday in 1821, Monroe's second inauguration; 1849, Taylor's inauguration; 1877, Hays; which were all celebrated the following day (Monday). In inaugural years the 4th of March will also fall on Sunday in 1917, 1945, 1973 and 2001. Almost all our presidential elections have occurred in leap years.

A. J., Kentucky. What is the Society of the Cincinnati?

The Society of the Cincinnati was founded by the French and American officers of the Continental Army at the close of the Revolutionary War. The first meeting took place in the camps on the Hudson. It was formed to perpetuate "the remembrance of this vast event, as well as the mutual friendships which have been formed under common danger, and, in many instances, cemented by the blood of the parties." Membership is limited to the descendants of the original members in the line of the eldest son. It at present numbers about six hundred and fifty-two. There is a branch in France composed of descendants of officers who came over with Lafayette and Rochambeau.

James E. N., Saratoga Springs, N. Y. Will you kindly tell me where I can find the poem containing the line:

"I hope to meet my Pilot face to face when I have crossed the bar."

The line is from Tennyson's poem, entitled "Crossing the Bar," and may be found in any late edition of the poet's works.

E. W. W., ——. 1. Why is Elijah called Elias in the New Testament and Isaiah Esaias? 2. What is the meaning of the word Selah in the Psalms? 3. What is the meaning of the abomination mentioned in Daniel 12:11?

1. They are both the Greek form of the Hebrew word, the New Testament being written in Greek while the Old Testament was written chiefly in Hebrew. 2. It is not certainly known, but is supposed to have been a direction to the singers, meaning a pause in the music. 3. Some horrible sacrilege that will be committed by Antichrist. Some expositors think it was fulfilled when Antiochus offered swine's flesh on the altar of the Temple.

S. P., Lynn Center, Ill. 1. Have New Mexico and Arizona been admitted as one State, and Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as another? 2. What are their capitals?

1. No; bills were introduced in Congress for their admission as States, but were defeated. 2. The capital of New Mexico is Santa Fe; of Arizona, Phœnix; of Oklahoma, Guthrie. Indian Territory is not organized.

E. A. S., Alpine, N. Y. I have been trying to serve the Master for over forty years. While about my household duties, or at any other time I feel my heart overflow with his love, I pray without bending on my knees, whereas if I stop and kneel, I feel almost speechless. Do you think such service is acceptable to God?

Posture in prayer is not material. While kneeling is in itself an attitude of natural reverence, it is not essential. One can pray as acceptably while walking on the street, riding on the cars, or going about one's daily avocations, as at any other time. God looks to the heart, and upon its condition the acceptability of our petitions depends, and on nothing else. This should not be interpreted as against bowing the knee in prayer, however, for that is the familiar reverential attitude of nearly all believers.

J. P. B., Vt. 1. What is the origin of May-day? 2. What are its observances?

1. May-day (the name given to the first day of that month in England) is undoubtedly of Roman origin, as Maia was the name of the mother of Mercury, to whom the Romans made sacrifices on the first of the month. 2. It was the custom in England for people of all ranks to rise at dawn and go "a-Maying" to greet the coming spring. A May-pole was erected on the village green for the May dance. The last pole erected for this celebration in London was 100 feet high. Each village elected its Queen of the May, and various characters took part in the festival.

L. P. M., Crete, Neb. What was the number of the guard placed by the chief priests at the Saviour's tomb? It was an exceeding important guard.

It was probably the usual Roman guard of four soldiers—a quaternion.

Mrs. A. M. H., Myersville, O. A Christian should not need to ask such a question. We should avoid even the appearance of evil, and if we believe that certain amusements have sinful associations, we should avoid them, if not for our own sake, then for the sake of others, lest we should be setting up a stumbling block for their feet.

S. F. H., Tackner, Mo. The church-going people here had a discussion as to when and where the first church was mentioned in the Bible.

The word "church" was first applied by St. Luke to the company of original disciples at Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2: 47), and was afterward widely applied to the whole Christian body or society of believers (Eph. 5:27), as well as in a narrower scale to the individual companies of believers under different pastors (I. Cor. 12: 18, also I. Cor. 11: 18). In Matt. 16: 18 the word "church" refers to the whole company of the elect, called under the new dispensation.

H. E. D., Corry, Pa. What was the "deliverance unto Satan" mentioned by Paul. (I. Timothy 1:20)?

Probably excommunication, Satan being considered the ruler of all outside the church. It doubtless included sickness or some grievous trouble, which Paul hoped would lead to their restoration.

C. W., Easton, Minn. What has become of the Philistines?

Their ancient land has shared the desolation common to all the section stretching along the sea-coast from Egypt to Phœnicia. Only a few miserable villages remain, the rest being now largely desert and abandoned to the Bedouin Arabs, who feed their flocks there. The Philistines themselves have been absorbed by Jews, Greeks, Syrians and other nations.

F. B. Z., Leavenworth, Kans. Why did the Revisers of the Bible omit certain verses that the authorized version contained?

They were omitted because it was found that they were interpolations. The most ancient copies of the New Testament did not contain them.

M. R., Bement, Ill. Kindly name fifteen American authors of the past.

Bret Harte, Mrs. H. B. Stowe, Helen H. Jackson, Washington Irving, Susan Warner, Mrs. Sarah Willis Parton (Fanny Fern), Mrs. S. J. Lippincott (Grace Greenwood), James Russell Lowell, Donald G. Mitchell (Ike Marvel), Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Walt Whitman, Whittier, Holmes, Emerson, and Longfellow.

E. S. K., Caro, Mich. Why did the writer of the 137th Psalm give a blessing to those who destroyed little children, in the last verse of his Psalm?

He was so intensely patriotic, that he wished all manner of evil to the enemies of his nation. In the Old Testament and in the New you may see that the Jews, considering themselves the chosen people of God, regarded all other peoples as outcast and despicable. You will see in Acts 11:3 that they would have kept Gentiles out of the church if they could.

Q. 1. Is there a monument to the memory of President McKinley? 2. Where is the Prison Ship Martyr's Monument to stand?

1. Yes: it was erected over a year ago t Adams, in the western part of Massahusetts. The money for a national memrial has been collected, and we believe it to be erected at Canton, O. 2. There a martyr's monument in Trinity Churchard, New York City. There is one to be uilt by various patriotic societies, which ill stand in Brooklyn, N. Y.

eader. What is the origin of the term "ragtime," and to what particular class of modern music does it apply?

We do not know where the name "ragme" originated, but rag-time music is uilt on syncopated notes or tones. The se of the syncopations when the movement is accelerated, gives the rag-time ffect. H. P. Main.

H. A., Tapleyville, Mass. What were the names of the three "wise men" of the East?

Tradition gives them as Caspar, Melnior, and Balthasar. They do not appear the Bible.

H., Patchogue, N. Y. I have read in the daily papers that the recent battle of Moukden is the greatest in history, both as regards the numbers engaged and the number killed? Is this correct?

No; at the battle of Arbela in 331 B.C., arius had 1,000,000. He was totally efeated by the Greeks under Alexander, ho only had a force of 40,000 infantry nd 1,000 cavalry. The Persian loss was bout 200,000 killed. In 451 A.D. was ought the battle of Chalons, in northern rance. Attila led a force of 500,000. ctius opposed him with a mixed force of omans, Franks, Ostrogoths, Alinis and urgundians. They numbered, it is said, 0,000. The Huns were defeated with a ss of at least 160,000 men. This means tually killed, as few prisoners were taken that period of the world's history, and the wounds made by the heavy weapons of the day, were generally fatal. At the battle of Tours, in 732 A.D., Charles Martel, with a mixed army of Franks and Aquitanians, defeated the Saracens, who numbered 1,000,000, and lost 300,000 in the battle and pursuit. The battle of Moukden is, without doubt, the greatest battle of modern times, but it should be remembered that the reports of losses include wounded and missing, as well as the number killed.

Concerning the 40,000 Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, received from you some weeks since, the writer has waited to test the books in every-day use, in connection with his editorial duties, and desires to say that the work has met the test fully. Few quotations have been searched for unsuccessfully, and you are entitled a vote of thanks for placing such a useful work before the people at so low a price.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. A. W., Toronto, Can. A majority of the railroads refuse to employ drinking men in any capacity. Moreover, Governor Hanley, of Indiana, announced recently that no drinking man would receive an appointment under his administration.

Mrs. E. W. E., Bethlehem, Pa. We think it a good plan for Christian Churches to use unfermented wine for sacramental purposes.

F. M. N., Pana, Ill. These matters you can readily find fully answered in any American Encyclopedia in your local library.

E. S. Painesville, O. Automobiles have come to stay. They are proving a great benefit in many ways. Properly handled by competent persons, and run at reasonable speed, they need not be regarded as a menace to any neighborhood.

Mrs. J. G., Marfa, Tex. Missionary Paton and wife are still living. Mrs. Paton is somewhat of an invalid. We don't know whether there are any children.

In the "Called Higher" column of our February 22d issue, it was stated that Mrs. Louisa Cresswell had passed away. It was Mrs. Susan Allkire, mother of Mrs. Cresswell, who passed away at her home in Bridgeton, N. J.

Sarah J. W., East Avon, N. Y. Will some Christian Herald reader tell me where I can find the poem entitled, "Tacking Ship Off Fire Island," by Rev. Walter Mitchell?

A LITTLE LAMB ASTRAY

OH, I wonder if there ever was
A little girl like me,
With so many, many heartaches,
That nobody seems to see?
Oft I've heard the great wise preacher,
And the elders, good and kind,
Tell about the way to heaven,
And how easy 'tis to find.

And I've thought and thought about it,
For I long to know the way;
But I'm such an awful sinner,
That sometimes I cannot pray.
How I wish they'd come and tell me,
How their Jesus I might greet!
For, they say, he loves the children,
And will guide their tender feet,

Into pastures green and pleasant,
And by waters calm and still,
Make them gems of brilliant beauty,
Their Redeemer's crown to fill.
But 'twas just while at our home-gate,
When our pastor's step I heard,
That I thought he saw me listening,
And would stop and speak a word.

When he only said "Good morning,"
With the usual "Are you well?"
Though I pressed the hand he gave me,
Hoping thus my grief to tell.
Then I stole away in secret,
And I cried so very long,
That mamma was greatly troubled,
For she feared I had done wrong.

And, at night, she tucked me snugly
In my little trundle-bed,
And so softly pressed the tear-stains
With a loving kiss, but said
Not a word about her Jesus,
I was hungering so to know.
Oh, my poor heart was breaking,
For I long to find Him so!

I have tried so hard to seek Him,
But I do not know the way;
And nobody seems to notice
There's a little lamb astray.
Does their Jesus care, I wonder,
If I ever find his fold?
Now, I'm almost sure I love Him,
Though I'm not so very old.

I should think the grown up people
Would so love to speak his name,
When He did so much to bring them
To the home from which He came.
And when I'm a Christian mamma,
I will tell my little girl
Simply how to come to Jesus,
How to find the precious pearl.

Then I'll tell the dear, good pastors,
Who know the way so well:
"Always stop the little children,
And the sweet old story tell." E. J. K.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Princess in Calico

IT will be welcome news to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, that Edith Ferguson Black's beautiful story, under the above title, may now be obtained in book form. Its serial publication in these columns was a blessing to many a home. How many discontented, frivolous girls were led by it, to see the grandeur of a life of self-sacrificing service, may never be known, but the number could not have been small. We sincerely hope that its present publication will extend its influence to other homes. The lesson it teaches needs to be learned, for it blesses the subjects and makes them a blessing to parents and brothers and sisters. There are so many young people who long for the opportunity to do some great thing, and overlook the work that lies near to them, in which there is true heroism. The work, as in the case of the heroine, is often menial, but when it is done from a high motive, it brings its reward. What that reward is, readers of A Princess in Calico fully realize. The story is so true to life, the circumstances it describes are so like those in thousands of homes, that it is easy for a girl to apply its lessons. There is no difficulty in getting young people to read it, for its interest is maintained from beginning to end. When they have read it they will have a new idea of the life that seems humdrum to them now, and will see how noble it may be made. Miss Black has succeeded in the task to which preachers devote themselves of applying Christ's teaching to modern life. We heartily recommend the book to parents everywhere. Their children will be the better for reading it, and incidentally they, too, may learn valuable lessons. Published, price eighty cents, by the Union Press, 1,122 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

In Famine Land*

IT is a deeply interesting and thrilling story that Dr. J. E. Scott tells in his work, under the above title, of the great famine in India in 1900. Dr. Scott is a missionary in Rajputana, where the famine was most severely felt, and he saw it in all its horrors. He took a prominent part in relief work, and gratefully acknowledges how much of that work was the result of the contributions of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Without the money they gave, the missionaries would have been obliged to witness suffering, starvation and death, yet have been unable to mitigate the distress. His chapters on the cause and prevention of famines in India, which are introductory to his story of this particular famine, shed a flood of light on conditions in India which it was difficult to understand. Dr. Klopsch's visit during the height of the famine revealed the horrors of the situation, which grew out of the conditions that Dr. Scott describes. Our readers will see from his book how stupendous was the task that their gifts enabled the missionaries to perform, and how joyfully they labored in it. It will cheer the hearts of many who made sacrifices to contribute to the famine relief fund, to read, after a graphic description of appalling suffering, such entries as the following:

In June, thirty-seven wagons containing seven thousand four hundred bags of maize were received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD corn-ship Quito, and from this the kitchens were supplied, and grain-shops were opened at convenient centres, where the poor could get a gratuitous daily dole, and others could purchase for a nominal price. From these shops were gathered nearly ten thousand rupees, which were again distributed in the form of food and clothing.

Many interesting incidents are related of individual cases of rescue, which, though Dr. Scott modestly refrains from referring to it, show how alert the missionaries were, and how indefatigably they labored to relieve the miseries of the awful visitation. It was right that a history of the calamity and of the enlightened efforts made to mitigate it, should be written, and Dr. Scott has done it with remarkable ability.

Fly Sample Colors and Illustrated Booklet Free on Request.

Carrara Paint works wonders in the appearance of the home. It adds new life and beauty to any kind of woodwork. It lasts longer than the best white lead and oil and costs less. It gives the home a cheerful appearance and an air of prosperity as well.

Carrara Paint is not affected by climatic conditions, such as fogs, rain, sea air or the burning sun. It has stood the test of years of service in all parts of the country and has given universal satisfaction. When you use it, you do so with the assurance and knowledge that you are getting value received for your money and that the results will fully justify the outlay. It is no experiment. There is but one CARRARA, and only one grade, which is always the best. It is made by the Carrara Paint Co., 184 Carrara Works, Barberton, O. Anyone having anything to paint should send for fifty free sample colors and our handsome, illustrated booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted with this great paint. Write to-day, telling us what you have to paint and we will send you names of those who have used Carrara Paint in your locality, name of dealer in your town who carries it, and show you how to beautify your property and save half your paint bill in the future.

What Shall We Do For Our India Orphans?

By REV. R. A. HUME, Missionary at Ahmednagar

MY DEAR DOCTOR KLOPSCH: I have been in America nine and a-half months for vacation, after thirty years of service as a missionary in India. In fourteen States I have made one hundred and ninety addresses on missionary matters. At the close of most addresses, rich people and poor people have come to ask me about the work which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been doing for famine children in India. To all such I have had great pleasure in saying that I know of a certainty that no modern Christian work has been done which has had so unique and promising results. Many of those children are turning out very well indeed. I have yet to meet one patron of such children who is not ready to continue to support his or her child, so long as it may be necessary, and I have influenced a few persons to become, for the first time, patrons of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD famine children in India.

But while I have been here, the young missionaries in India who have been looking after the children whom I left in their care, have been writing me that they have found it very difficult to take care of those children, and for lack of means, they have been obliged to turn away a few children for whom we have cared for years. They have said that they could not possibly continue to look after those children unless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD continued, in some way, to send support for those children still longer. We have taught a great many of those children useful industries, and a few have already learned how to support themselves entirely; some have learned how to do so in part; but a great many of the children were very small, and will not be able for several years to support themselves. Some of them are likely to be useful Christian workers, and ought to go to school for some years to come. Therefore, I very, very earnestly, entreat you to do what you can to lead the patrons of those children to continue to support them for some years to come. If the support is now entirely cut off, many of the best results of devotion and generosity in the past will be entirely lost; whereas, if support is continued for a few years longer, very fine results are sure to come.

What would be a more suitable undertaking for Easter for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD than to make a new pledge to look after those children for three years more, for whom they have already done so much? Your paper has such splendid organization, and has such confidence from Christian people in America, that I sincerely hope you can, yourself, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, make the arrangement which I indicate. And I make this request not simply for myself, but for all my associates in the missions of all denominations in India. R. A. HUME.

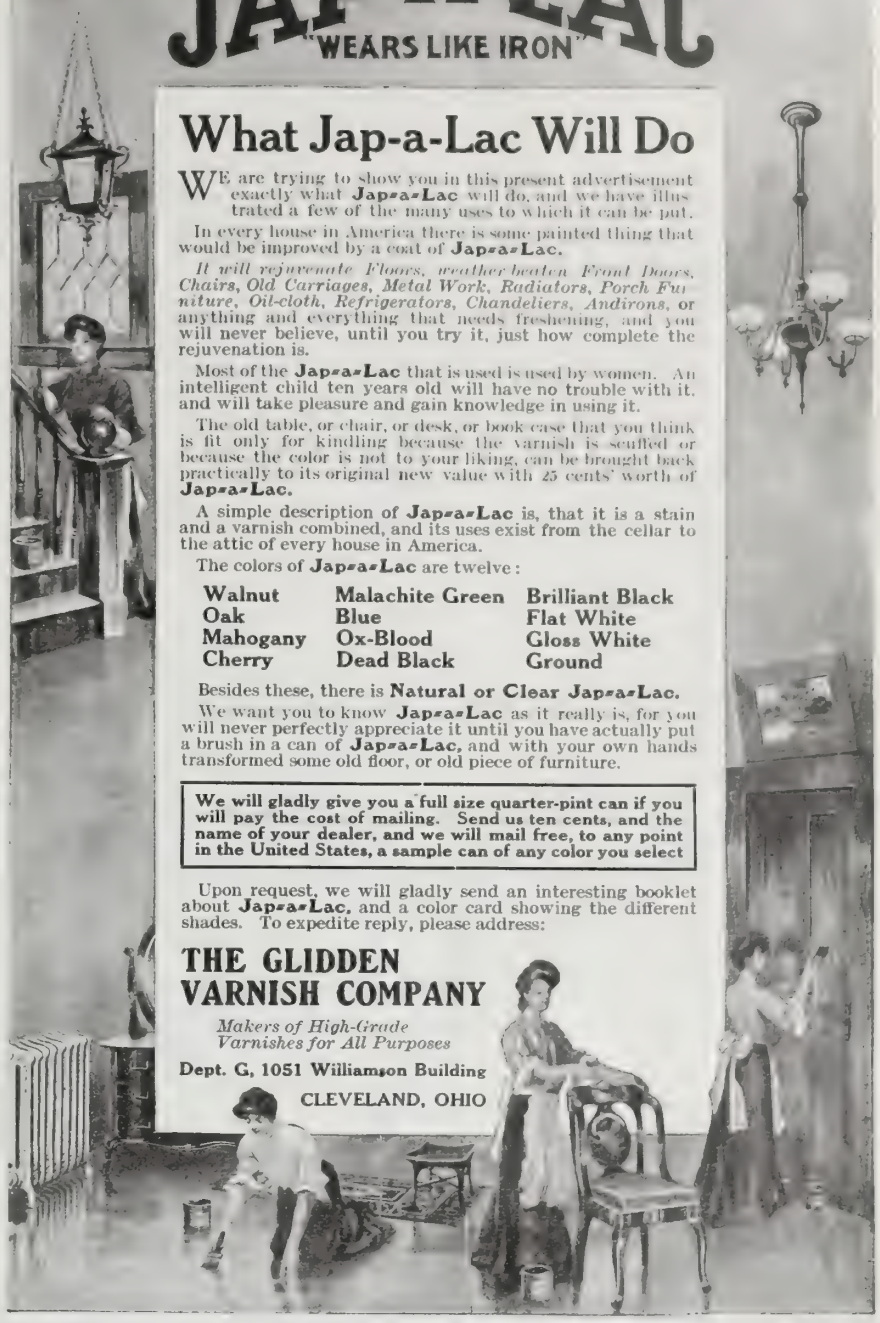
Speaking for the India missionaries generally, and also for the 5,500 orphan children of that country, who have been supported and trained through the generous provision of our readers for the last four and a-half years, Dr. Hume's plea is one which deserves the most earnest consideration. Large numbers of these orphans are now being trained in industrial occupations, which will result in making them self-supporting men and women later on; but the industrial experiment, while proving satisfactory wherever it has been tried, is still in its infancy and cannot be continued unless it has outside support.

We believe that our friends, who have stood so nobly and so generously by the orphans of India thus far, will take to their hearts this new and highly interesting phase of the situation. It is God's leading that these children—the future Christian army of India—should be thus cast upon our loving care. Let us not forsake them.

JAP-A-LAC
"WEARS LIKE IRON"



What Jap-a-Lac Will Do

WE are trying to show you in this present advertisement exactly what Jap-a-Lac will do, and we have illustrated a few of the many uses to which it can be put.

In every house in America there is some painted thing that would be improved by a coat of Jap-a-Lac.

It will rejuvenate Floors, weather-beaten Front Doors, Chairs, Old Carriages, Metal Work, Radiators, Porch Furniture, Oil-cloth, Refrigerators, Chandeliers, Andirons, or anything and everything that needs freshening, and you will never believe, until you try it, just how complete the rejuvenation is.

Most of the Jap-a-Lac that is used is used by women. An intelligent child ten years old will have no trouble with it, and will take pleasure and gain knowledge in using it.

The old table, or chair, or desk, or book-case that you think is fit only for kindling because the varnish is scuffed or because the color is not to your liking, can be brought back practically to its original new value with 25 cents' worth of Jap-a-Lac.

A simple description of Jap-a-Lac is, that it is a stain and a varnish combined, and its uses exist from the cellar to the attic of every house in America.

The colors of Jap-a-Lac are twelve:

Walnut	Malachite Green	Brilliant Black
Oak	Blue	Flat White
Mahogany	Ox-Blood	Gloss White
Cherry	Dead Black	Ground

Besides these, there is Natural or Clear Jap-a-Lac.

We want you to know Jap-a-Lac as it really is, for you will never perfectly appreciate it until you have actually put a brush in a can of Jap-a-Lac, and with your own hands transformed some old floor, or old piece of furniture.

We will gladly give you a full size quarter-pint can if you will pay the cost of mailing. Send us ten cents, and the name of your dealer, and we will mail free, to any point in the United States, a sample can of any color you select

Upon request, we will gladly send an interesting booklet about Jap-a-Lac, and a color card showing the different shades. To expedite reply, please address:

God Revealed in Christ*

ONE of the most interesting methods of studying the Bible, is to trace from the earliest books to the later, the growing revelation of God. In the Pentateuch, in Job, the historical books, notably the second book of Kings and the earlier prophets, the idea presented of God's character differs materially from the conception of it in Isaiah, Jeremiah and the prophets of the exile. The light was growing from the faintness of dawn, to the clearer light of day. As men were able to understand, God revealed himself, until the time came for the noonday revelation in the person of Christ. He who had spoken through the prophets, spoke through his Son, and at last the world learned what God really is. The earlier teachers knew him as a great Ruler, a jealous God, an avenger, fierce, angry, implacable; the later Old Testament writers obtained a glimpse of his mercy and beneficence, as we find in some of the Psalms and in the prophecies written after the exile; but it was not until Christ came and revealed him as a Father, that men associated with him the idea of tender affection and ineffable love.

As we dwell on that marvelous life, so beautiful that even men who revile religion and morality, bend in reverence before it, we see the glory and the beauty of the Deity. In our admiration of the patience, gentleness, simplicity, compassion for the afflicted, magnanimity for the erring that showed themselves in Christ's life, we are drawn near to him as to a brother, and to our amazement we hear his words, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." You have been groping after him with blind hands; you have been fearing and trembling as you thought of him; yet now that you see him in me, you admire and love.

Yet let us not mistake. The character of Christ was not all gentleness. If it had been, it would have been weak and unjust. To him all evil was abhorrent. The scourging of the money changers in the temple; the scathing denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees and hypocrites; the declaration of the doom of the impenitent — all showed that his love and mercy did not spring from indifference to moral evil. To the penitent, to the returning prodigal, to the adulterous woman, words of peace and kindness, but to the obdurate sinner only reproof and warning. In this light, too, how terrible are the words: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

More than half the quarrels and alienations of life come from one person misunderstanding the character of another. A novelist of the last century draws an affecting picture of a father's disappointment in his son. The father loved the boy intensely and was so concerned for his welfare that he sternly corrected his faults. The son regarded him as harsh and cruel and became rebellious. The alienation of the boy would have been permanent had not an uncle taken him in hand. He explained to the boy how proud his father was of him, how anxious that his life should be clean and honorable. He convinced him that his father's sternness was really the expression of his love, and so established good filial relations. So it is that men learn to love God. Jesus shows them that God loves them and his laws and warnings are directed to wean them from the sin that ruins them.

In another story true to the life, a mechanic had drifted into atheism, or rather, believing in the existence of God, into hating him. He made the acquaintance of a clergyman, who visited him in a hospital, where he was lying recovering from an injury. He repulsed the clergyman, but could not offend him. On his recovery, he learned that some one had been visiting his family, looking after their comfort and supplying them with necessaries. His wife and children were full of the praises of their mysterious friend. The convalescent wanted to see him to thank him, but he was always at his work when he called. At last they met, and, to his surprise, it was the clergyman, whom he had repulsed in the hospital. They grew to be friends, and when he had been won to Christ, he said to the clergyman: "I owe it all to you; I saw God in you. I found I had been mistaken, both in you and Him. You have revealed Him to me."

San Diego, California

San Diego is the last important natural sea port in the United States to be developed, and offers the only remaining chance for investors to share in the profits derived from the rapid growth of Harbor cities

San Diego is destined to become the most important port on the Pacific Coast because it is the nearest of Call for all steamers from the South Pacific Islands, South America, Europe and the Atlantic Coast by of the Panama Canal.

San Diego is the southern terminus of one great transcontinental railway system. Another road is building and still another is surveyed. Ocean freight and passenger traffic will then be diverted to San D because the distance is shorter to all inland points in the great Southwest.

Good harbors on the Pacific Coast are few, and the nearest is San Francisco, over 400 miles north.

San Diego has the finest and most even climate in the world, and is a great winter resort for eastern pe a popular summer resort for southwesterners, and a delightful all-the-year residence city for those who genal climate. Eastern capital has been pouring into San Diego for some time. The city has 25,000 inhabit Building permits were $1,914,367 last year. 400 residences and several business blocks were built.

CALLED FORTH

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

HOW limited we are by past experiences and by the power of the things that are seen! Looking at things in general in their relation to ourselves, rather than in their relation to God, we leave God no room, because of our unbelief, to manifest himself, as he might do, if we took all things in the light of the glory of God, that the Son of God might be glorified thereby. What a picture met Jesus at the little house in Bethany! He had sent a message of life, but his word had been set on one side; and the fact of death, which he had already twice overcome, reigned supreme in that house of his friends! Had the sisters believed, there would have been none of the Jews consoling Martha and Mary; they would have been saying to the Jews: "Although Lazarus is dead, he will live again. The Master has said, This sickness is not unto death. Death cannot prevail over him." Had the disciples believed, there would have been no talk of going to die with Lazarus; there would have been a great awe-struck anticipation of what Jesus was about to do.

How much of the mighty power of God, which is needed to move the hearts of sinners around us, is waiting until we take our eye off past instruments and methods, and fix them upon the present power of a mighty God within us! How much of the avowed powerlessness to meet the needs of the heathen comes, not so much from the pressing need of men and money, as from the far more pressing need of a mighty working from above! Something that shall glorify neither missionaries nor missionary societies, but God himself, whose hand is not shortened that it cannot save, and whose ear is not grown heavy that it cannot hear? Life from the Living One is the power which can convict of sin, convert and transform the life of the greatest sinner and the most idolatrous heathen.

When Martha and Mary heard that Jesus was coming, Martha went and met him, but Mary sat still in the house. And Martha, when she met him, had no word to speak about his message; she was disappointed: things had not turned out as she had expected. "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." "Thy brother shall rise again," he said, and Martha, measuring his word by her experience, speaks of the resurrection at the last day, as though the Lord had not already raised the dead!

"I am the Resurrection and the Life"—I, the I am—"he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Could it be that the dead Lazarus had believed the message which his sisters were so slow to believe, and that he closed his eyes to this life with a certainty that very soon he should be raised from the dead? Did he take it literally that this sickness was not unto death, and that even if he did die, death's Conqueror would resurrect him? The father of them that believe accounted that God was able to raise up Isaac even from the dead (Heb. 11: 19), because he could not break his word, and he had surely declared: "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." If the Word of God could not be fulfilled without the resurrection of Isaac, then God would raise Isaac from the dead. And thus God was glorified in the faith of Abraham. May not God have been equally glorified in the faith of Lazarus, that if God's message: "This sickness is not unto death," required that he should be raised from the dead, then Christ would raise him. "And whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Our Lord came to redeem us from sin and death, but the full fruit of his redemption work can accrue to him only when he can come and take away his redeemed and waiting people to meet him in the air. It is "then shall come to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." But the Lord's words to Martha convey the thought that this might have been in that generation, "whosoever liveth not," shall live; he that believeth not, shall believe.

Martha went and called Mary secretly, and when Mary heard that the Master was come and called for her, she arose quickly, and came to him. But Mary had nothing more to say to him than Martha. It was the same reproach, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." How little they knew the opportunity they had missed!

White Lead, Zinc and Silica Make a Perfect Paint.

Do You Know Paints?

If a paint possesses the opacity (covering power) and easy working qualities of lead—the spreading and oil carrying capacity, whiteness and firmness of Zinc—the porosity, permanence and binding qualities of Silica—then it is good paint.

Only then will it wear five years—look well and protect well.

Poor paint either lacks one or more of these qualities—or the pigments are not used in correct proportions—or the pigments and liquids are only paddled together.

White lead alone chalks and is blown away—Zinc alone dries hard and brittle, and cracks and peels. The two combined lack porosity and are apt to blister.

A third pigment is necessary—Pattons have it in Silica, the principal element of glass—ground as fine as flour, it checks the chemical activity of lead and gives porosity to the paint.

PATTON'S SUN PROOF PAINTS

TRADE MARK REGISTERED

Patton's Sun-Proof Paints contain only the above pigments and absolutely pure linseed oil and the best turpentine driers. Then, you ask, if the ingredients are known, why are not home-made paints-mixed paints as good?

Because the knowledge of exact proportions is lacking—and chiefly because the pigments require a thorough mixing and grinding in their dry state, again in their paste form, again and again in their semi-liquid and liquid forms. And this is not possible without skilled labor and perfect and powerful machinery.

If you would know more about paints, what paints to use, what colors to choose, etc., write for our booklet, "Paint Queries."

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

W. J. C., Terre Haute, Ind. Is it right for any one except a regularly ordained minister of the Gospel to pronounce the benediction at the close of a service?

We see no reason why any Christian layman should not do so, on occasions where there is no clergyman present; but under ordinary circumstances, it would be unusual if not improper to have any one but an ordained preacher perform this office.

C. F., Ottawa, Kan. How many immigrants arrived in the United States during 1904?

The total recorded immigration was 812,870. This does not include persons from Canada and Mexico, as the constant arrival and departure of people from those countries make it impossible to secure accurate information. As the census of 1900 shows that there are 1,183,225 people in the United States, born in Canada, and 103,445 born in Mexico, it would seem that the number who immigrate to the United States yearly, must be very large.

H. P. S., Raleigh, N. C. What are the Catholic, Baptist, and Methodist totals in the United States? Also the negro population?

Following are present figures: Catholics in the United States, 9,891,869; Baptists, 4,735,775; Methodists, 6,192,494. Negro population, estimated, 8,840,789. Send to Census Bureau, Washington, for previous years, for comparison.

Reader, Texas. Who was Gertrude, the mother of Hamlet?

According to tradition, she was Gerutha, daughter of King Rurik of Denmark, and wife of Horvendill, a famous Viking and Governor of Jutland, to whom she bore a son, Amleth. Horvendill's brother, Fenno, being in love with Gerutha, killed the Governor, and then persuaded the widow to wed himself. Some authorities claim a historical basis for Hamlet, but others affirm that it is a Scandinavian myth, and formed a part of the Skjoldunga Saga, now lost.

Mrs. B. S. L. Is there a passage in the Bible which states that thirty sons ruled over thirty cities in the land of Gilead.

Yes; you will find it in Judges 10 : 4.

P. E. S., Closter, Neb. King Oscar, as well as many other monarchs, has been a reader of this journal at different times, especially on those occasions when Americans were aiding suffering communities abroad. Our readers' benevolent efforts have been appreciated and recognized in India, Russia, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Cuba, Armenia, and several other lands.

F. M. H., Lemon, Calif. What became of the slaves who were freed by the Jews in the year of jubilee?

They mingled with the free population and probably sold their services for hire.

W. W. M., Belleville, Ont. If a person in Australia stood facing the west at noon, while the sun was shining, would not the sun be on his right hand, instead of the left, as it is in America, when a person stands facing the west at noon when the sun is shining?

If a person was exactly on the equator a noon sun would be exactly in his zenith, neither on his right or left. Should he, however, be south of the equator, or as your querist asks, in Australia, a noon sun would, if looking west, be on his right, and if in say North America, on his left.

Marathon, N. Y. Prof. Lewis Swift.

W. H. Z., Shamokin, Pa. Is Jacob's Well still in existence, and in what condition? Also the Pool of Bethesda?

Yes; a well which tradition declares to be the original Jacob's Well, is still pointed out near Nablus (the ancient Shechem). It is at the foot of Mount Gerizim, and is about nine feet in diameter and seventy-five feet deep. At some seasons it is dry. What many claim to be the pool of Bethesda is also in existence yet, being now called the "Birket Israel." It is close by St. Stephen's Gate and under the N. E. wall of the Haram area. There are others who hold that the pool was further south.

R. McM., Dundee, Mich. The only war that may be called justifiable, even on human grounds, is a war of defense for hearth, home, altar, country, freedom and religion. In a thoroughly Christian state of society, war would be impossible.

THE NEW CATHEDRAL IN BERLIN

On February 27, the twenty-fourth anniversary of the Emperor's marriage, the consecration of the magnificent new Evangelical Cathedral took place in Berlin, and was participated in by the German royal family and many visiting princes. It was a great Protestant demonstration. The Emperor's chaplain, Rev. D. Dryander, unlocked the entrance to the new house of God, and a grand procession entered the sacred edifice. The Kaiser and Kaiserin and the princes of their house, with the visiting princes, took their places in the western gallery. A large choir rendered the "Hallelujah Chorus" from Handel's Messiah; after which the Twenty-fifth Psalm was sung by the Cathedral choir. Then the congregation sang, "Alone, God, in the Heavens art Thou," under the direction of the instrumental choir. Chaplain Dryander then delivered the consecration address, in which he emphasized the meaning to Protestantism of the first cathedral in German lands and its influence upon Berlin and its surroundings.

Next followed the consecration prayer, and the Cathedral choir sang a selection from Mendelssohn, after which the congregation joined in singing, "Great God, We Praise Thee," accompanied by the grand organ, whose majestic tones filled the spacious hall. Then followed the liturgy by the Court preacher, Scripture readings, and the Creed, after which the congregation sang "Ein Feste Burg ist Unser Gott." The cathedral preacher, Pastor Kritzinger, delivered a short sermon and the congregation sang the closing lines of the great Lutheran hymn. This was followed by the closing liturgy, and the prayer and benediction.

The bells in all the Protestant churches in Berlin, Charlottenburg and Schoenberg were ringing as the Kaiser walked back to the palace.

Mrs. S. C., Toronto, Can. My children object very much to going to church. Should they be compelled to go once on Sunday, whether they object to it or not? Their ages are twelve, ten and eight years, respectively.

Legally and morally, they are still minors, and are consequently under your care and authority. You should exercise this authority, as you are responsible for their training and conduct. The State compels the parent to perform his duty in sending a child to public school. The Church is expected to urge a parent to perform his duty similarly in a religious way, and to see to it that the child receives religious instruction. They are obliged by law to yield you obedience as long as they are under age; but if they love and respect you, force will be unnecessary.

H. J. W., Farmington, Mich. When was Alaska purchased from the Russian government?

The territory of Alaska was purchased by the United States in 1867. The price paid was $7,200,000.

F. A. N., Milton, Ind. Who was St. Keyne? Can you direct me to any book in which I may get the story or legend?

St Keyne, according to legend, is the patron saint of Cornwall, England. There is a well there named after the saint, and the curious tradition is, that if a bridegroom gets the first drink, he will be master at home; if the bride, she will be the ruler of the house. You will find the poem on this well in Southey's works. Nothing reliable is known of St. Keyne, who was probably a mythical character.

M. G., Beloit, Wis. Is a minister of the Gospel doing the right thing to take money from saloon keepers for the purpose of building up churches, Sunday schools, etc.?

This subject was discussed at considerable length in The Christian Herald two years ago. The general opinion appeared to be that all gifts for God's work (that is, spiritual work exclusively, the work of upbuilding His Kingdom on earth) must be spotless and without blemish.

Mrs. J. Ruesch, Aurora, Ill., writes:

Dear Christian Herald! I am late,
But not too late the truth to state,
That you, a friend so pure and bright
Are every week a pleasant sight.
The Calendar a beauty is
To look at, it fills one with bliss;
The book on Manners shall be read,
And dividends henceforth be paid.

The 40,000 Thoughts indeed
A mine of wealth are, where our need,
Can surely be quite well supplied,
If time and thought be not denied,
I'm very fortunate indeed
Among the multitude you feed,
And now one more request I make,
The Great Hereafter I would take,
The mite, two dollars, find within,
You'll have no loss, I'll have great gain.

Reader, Williamstown, Mass. If a man shou marry, and in a few years die and leave children, can the widow hold all the propert or does she have a third, and the remainder to his brothers and sisters, or father and mot er, if living?

This depends on the State law. Ask Massachusetts lawyer.

H. W., Golconda, Ill. We do not doul there are instances occurring daily living in absolute dependence upon Go where there is faith in the heart and purit of purpose. We ourselves have known many such. The late George Muller Bristol, Dr. Cullis of Boston, and Rev. M Heydrick of Brooklyn, were among th notable instances of men who lived by fait and brought all their wants to God, wh abundantly supplied them.

G. G. W., West Bridge, N. H. Who was the auth of the expression, "Eternal vigilance is t price of liberty"?

John Philpot Curran coined the phras in a speech in Dublin, in 1790.

D. D. D., Geneva, Fla. What is the meaning the word "bank," in the parable of the talent

The Greek word in the original means literally, "table," and refers to the tabl of the money-changer. There were n banks in those days, as we know them.

Mrs. S. G. T., Omaha, Neb., writes:

Complying with the request for a poem in Th Mail Bag, I give the first two stanzas. The line were addressed to two sparrows, which flew int a church during divine service and perched upo the pulpit:

Gay, guiltless pair, what seek ye from
The fields of heaven?
Ye have no need of prayer,
Ye have no sins to be forgiven.
Why perch ye here, where mortals
To their Maker bend?
Can your spirits fear,
The God ye never could offend?

A CYCLONIC REVIVAL

By S. S. CRYOR, D.D.

HE revival at Dixon, Ill., is but a repetition of more than a score of similar services held by Evangelist Wm. A. Sunday in different cities. Ixon is the county seat of Lee County, Illinois, and h ten thousand inhabitants. It is situated in the Fck River Valley, one of the most picturesque spots ithe West. Rock River flows through the city, dividi it into North and South Ixon. It is an historic place. Araham Lincoln here took h first oath as an officer in t Black Hawk War, and vs sworn into the service of te United States by Jefferi Davis and Robert Anderson, both afterwards faus in the Civil War. A rmber of important factors are here, among them te largest condensing milk ftory in the world.

For more than a quarter da century, no general relious awakening had visited Ixon, until the advent of Vn. A. Sunday, on Februiv 16th. He came on the itation of the Ministerial Jnion representing seven urches—Baptist, Christian Ongregational, Evangelical, Lutheran, Methodist and esbyterian. A year was tken to get ready for the eetings. They were the bject of conversation in te home, and the theme of rmons in the pulpit. A nth before the time set r the meetings to begin, Union Sabbath Evening eetings were held in the churches, and cottage prayer-eetings were established all over the city. At the me time work was begun on a tabernacle to seat irty-three hundred people. All expenses incident to e meetings, including the cost of the tabernacle, ere floated in dollar shares among the different urches, each church taking its portion according to embership. This was a guarantee fund. No money as paid on these shares, but for two weeks in the eetings, offerings were taken, and at the end of that me $2,700 was in the hands of the treasurer, which ore than paid expenses.

This novel plan has been worked in at least twenty-ve cities, where tabernacles have been erected and eetings held. The two conditions on which Mr. Sunty goes to any town are, a union of the churches, and e erection of a tabernacle. The tabernacle is an exression of faith, and of the willingness of the churches undertake great things for God, and is worth months advertisement.

Mr. Sunday is ably assisted by two expert workers: ev. I. E. Honeywell, who precedes and starts the machinery in each place, and sees that it works without friction during the entire meetings; and Prof. Fred Fisher, who directs the large chorus of two hundred and fifty voices, as they lead the great congregation in song, or who, by an effective solo, forces home the truth of the sermon. From the first appeal to the unconverted to decide for Christ, the people have responded, coming first by twos and threes, then by scores. Soon one thousand had come. At the present writing, the number of those who confess Christ is from eighty to one hundred each night.

More than one-half of these are men and boys. A large per cent. of the men are old soldiers, to whom Mr. Sunday especially appeals, but every profession and calling is represented, from the laborer to the lawyer. Even bartenders and gamblers are among the number of converts. The proprietors of one gambling joint destroyed their wheels and tables, and closed their doors; society people by scores have publicly renounced cards and dancing; church members of years' standing have been converted; family altars have been established, and the entire spiritual life of the churches has been quickened.

Mr. Sunday is probably the most intense of evangelists. Veins swell and throb, sweat drops from his brow, and every shred of underwear must be changed after each service; yet it is not rage or rant. No one who knows the man could think of him as preaching otherwise. His words scathe and burn like forked lightning, shattering every refuge of lies; or they woo and win with the agony and pathos of love. This description has been given of his sermons:

> They give a vision of a cradle swinging. They give a vision of the inky pit, with the smoke and eternal fire of punishment. They are concentrated volumes in a nut shell. They have finely penciled picturing, with all the colorings of the rainbow. They have drawings etched in acid. They have oratorical periods, that are gems of English. They have that which reaches out and gets hold of men.

Like the fiery-tongued Finney, he lays bare the hidden sins of the heart and the corruption that lies beneath the social and civic life of a community, until men stand gazing awe-struck, and tremble at the thought that they have been living over a very Vesuvius of impurity and passion. The stern old truths of God's unchanging law are hurled at offenders with no glittering generalities, but with Nathan-like directness. For those who believe that such preaching would depopulate the churches, it is interesting to know that God is honoring this man as he is honoring no preacher of higher criticism and so-called liberal doctrines. Thousands have been won to Christ by the preaching of Mr. Sunday, whom God has raised up to boldly rebuke the timidity of the pulpit, and the unbelief in the old and time-tested doctrines of the Bible.

EVANGELIST W. A. SUNDAY SINGER F. G. FISHER

THE HEROISM OF CHRIST

A Sermon by Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, LL.D.

TEXT:—"I will go in the strength of the Lord God, I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only" Psalm 71:16

WHAT is courage? The basic condition of success, the operating factor of great design, the effective coefficient of high endeavor; that fundamental characteristic of humanity, the possession of which is necessary to the practice of all the virtues; that quality of mind which enables one to encounter danger and difficulty with firmness; that faculty by which we rise superior to bodily or physical conditions of menace; that active function of the soul which tramples as well upon intellectual restraints, and makes men do the right thing regardless of any consequences, personal or impersonal. The beginning of a series of great qualities in the practice of which man becomes a hero. Courage which is sometimes considered as physical and moral is really in its essence not susceptible of division.

Actions which arise from false pride, from habit, from nervous insensibility, from reckless disregard of consequences, from constitutional carelessness; the bravado of the condemned criminal, the immobility of the tortured Indian, the fury of the old Berserker, the brutish ferocity of the public pugilist, the resignation of the fatalist, the indifference of the veteran—what Macaulay calls the common courage of the soldier — while they are all evidences of some indwelling quality or qualities which receive a certain and ready response from our lower natures—the animal in us—are not to be confounded with those great actions, great, though they may take upon themselves, to our limited apprehension the semblance of humility, which springs from a sense of duty. Actions which go back to the great principle of "oughtness," which are the true manifestations of the quality of courage, that faculty by which we do and love the right because it is the right, and for no other reason whatsoever.

Manliness in Daily Life

We are told in quaint old books that the four cardinal virtues are justice, prudence, temperance, fortitude. We read in sacred Scripture that the fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; to these we may, with propriety, add modesty, chastity, patience; but they all require courage that they may be practiced with effect. If any doubt, let him try tomorrow to be humble, to be meek, to be longsuffering, to be peaceful, to turn the right cheek when the left is struck, to be pure, and pure in spirit, to be a peacemaker. I am much mistaken if it does not require the co-operation of every manly quality, and the exercise of the highest resolution, to accomplish the least of these great undertakings. I dare affirm that it requires more pure, unadulterated courage to be smitten and not strike back, to be reviled and keep silent, than it did to stand in the pass of Thermopylæ. Very few of us are equal to these things.

It takes men to be Christians to-day, just as it did in the past, and the demand upon manhood now is ever as it was and shall be ever. The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by storm.

No nation, no people, no epoch, has been without its men of courage. I do not refer simply to the exploits of the conspicuous soldier, the great captain merely, to the man who has played a leading part in some great drama of history under the stress of ambition, or love of power, or what you will. I do not regard, to take a most conspicuous instance of greatness, Napoleon as a man of supreme courage, a hero; rather as a monster and a cad, who "made his way to Empire over broken oaths and through a sea of blood." Your man of true courage is always a gentleman. But I do refer to the man who has grandly done his duty, undaunted by opposition, undeterred by menace, undismayed by the consequences to himself; the man who, under the inspiration of that great principle of love which lies at the root of duty, has risen to such a height that we may with perfect propriety describe him as one of the sons of God.

True Heroism

What's the hero? "The man," as Emerson says: "who can take both reputation and life in his hand, with perfect urbanity dare both the gibbet and the mob, by the absolute truth of his speech and the rectitude of his behavior." The man who thinks nothing of life or temporal prosperity in comparison with devotion to duty. Soldiers like Gideon on the plains of Beth-horon; Horatius at the Tiber bridge; Quintus Curtius leaping into the gulf in the Forum; Leonidas staying the East in the pass; Arminius in the hyperborean regions beyond the Rhine; Von Winkelried making way for liberty at Sempach; Coligny never victorious yet ever undefeated; Nelson at Trafalgar; Washington, the father of liberty; philosophers like Aristides, banished for justice sake, or Socrates drinking the hemlock; saints like Stephen and John the Baptist, convicting the king on his throne; priests like Ambrose repelling the guilty Theodosius and Athanasius against the world; reformers like Wycliffe and Tyndale and Luther; patriots like Hampden and Emmet, L'Ouverture and Lincoln; aye, women too: Awia, Boadicea, Perpetua, Joan of Arc, and Florence Nightingale.

The Supreme Name

But I cite a grander name. Truth to-day has its hearing. The enlightened judgment of mankind, when it places the names of the heroes of nations upon the diptychs of history "will put down Phocion for the Greek, and Brutus for the Roman; Hampden for England, Fayette for France; choose Washington as the bright consummate flower of our earlier civilization, and Abraham Lincoln the ripe fruit of our noon day;" then dipping the pen in the sunlight of heaven, will write in the clear blue above the name of the soldier, the statesman, the martyr, the Man, Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God. Not the possession of a favored nation nor a chosen people, but the common property, the hero, the man of courage for all mankind. For it is courage by which man becomes a hero; courage, purpose, endurance, action, these are in the list.

Heroism in Religion

It has ever been the practice of mankind to worship the hero. "Worship of the hero is the transcendent admiration of a great man." I say great men are still admirable; I say there is at bottom nothing else admirable; no nobler feeling than this of admiration for one higher than himself dwells in the breast of man. It is to this hour and at all hours, the vivifying influence in man's life. As Carlisle has said, "Religion, I find, stands upon it; not paganism only, but far higher and truer religions, all religion hitherto known. Hero worship; heartfelt, prostrate admiration; submission, burning, boundless; for a noblest, godlike form of man, is not that the germ of Christianity itself?" Let us look to-day at Christ as the man of courage, the hero of men. It is a misfortune that human opinion should fluctuate as it does. Prevalent opinion in those ideas which dominate different epochs of intellectual tendency is usually at one extreme or the other, like a swinging pendulum never at rest on the line of perpendicularity which marks the happy mean of true propriety. Thought is not frequently a state of equilibrium and men are generally striving to attain, or retain, a balance. The proportionate thinker, the person with an equable mind, who has breadth and discernment to realize a fact in all its lights and bearings is a heaven-man; he only comes once in an æon, perhaps, and when he does appear the generations rise up and call him blessed.

The Many-Sided Christ

We must, of course, realize and preach our Lord as whole. All the world which claims to be Christian is preaching a Christ, but in so many instances it is a one-sided Christ. Some attribute, quality, instance, incident, saying our Lord's life, is seized to the exclusion of other developments of equal importance. Great religious movements have sprung from the effort to emphasize some hitherto neglected phase of Christian belief and that phase has been preached until it has become the prime article of faith to the exclusion of all others. So a schism is engendered, or another so-called church is established.

Christ is an entity to be studied from two co-ordinate points of view, the Divine and the Human. One of these phases of the Saviour is largely neglected at the expense of the other. Perhaps in our desire to combat Unitarianism, the humanity, or at least one phase of the manliness of Christ is not sufficiently dwelt upon. Let us address ourselves to that in this instance.

The whole world seems to be in a conspiracy to stress the fact of Christ's manhood in his womanhood and divinity. I say womanhood reverently and advisedly because he certainly represents all the tenderness, grace, sympathy, and refinement which cluster about and associate themselves with the idea of woman, as well as devoted and affectionate qualities which the mater instinct develops; but he was something else. He possesses other and more rugged qualities frequently forgotten. The sermons, the stories, the poems, and especially the pictures and other so-called representations usually portray tenderness, meekness—alas, weakness!—at the expense of everything else, our Saviour a weeping woman!

Divine Manliness

Habit has so crystallized itself in this direction, encysted the Lord in a shrine of feminine delicacy and nothing else, that we have lost sight of the intellectual force, the moral courage, the physical daring of the Man. A change, an innovation in thought is looked upon as heresy, as almost blasphemy. I have known clergymen to hold up their hands in horror at a presentation of the manliness of the Saviour in this way as irreverent, and yet I have seen other men come with thanksgiving as at a new revelation. There are many men who will yield a cold, careless, intellectual assent to the dogma of Christ, the man, as God; who will be won to enthusiastic, loving, devoted allegiance to the dogma of Christ the God as man.

I confess the more I study our Lord's life the more impressed and overjoyed am I at the splendid quality he evidenced as man. His courage, his fortitude, his purpose, his endurance, his staying power, his matchless audacity, his firmness, his decision, his unbending resolution; the brilliancy of his intellect as well as his tenderness and his love, fill me with the highest admiration and win my devotion in the most entire way.

Who is like him? Give us a man with the courage of John, the patience of Job, the magnanimity of Esau and couple these with the guilessness of Nathanael, the wisdom of Solomon, the logic of Aristotle, and the eloquence of Pericles, and the brilliant portrait lacks nothing of the character of the Saviour. And then between the lines of simple Biblical narration when I read of his conduct before the astute questions of the Pharisee, the Sadducee, the Herodian, and see the ease with which perfect dignity he effected a reversal of the condition and put them on trial in the dilemma; the way he had the courage and insight to treat the woman taken in adultery; when I see how he cut to the core of every sham, of every folly, of every subtlety, with the plain and simple courage of the man who sees the truth and follows it at all hazards; I realize that it was and is no empty title to call him, Master.

Above Bigotry

In every situation how he dominated. When I think of his moral courage in daring to take the reformed harlot into his fellowship—who dares do that to-day? When I think of his courage in braving those passions—the deadliest known to man—of religious bigotry, by openly disregarding; or, in the interest of a higher law of holiness or a greater need, by trampling upon tho remonial observances, or unworthy and prejudiced ductions, which the subtle mental mind had fastened on the people as necessary to the development of ritual life, I am lost in admiration.

A Marvel of Fortitude

When I think of his courage in what he endured — t so much the physical torture, that might be borne many, in case of need, in silence—but the greater guish of a broken heart from destroyed faith, shat-ed trust, betrayed hope, withdrawn allegiance, false end; ay, when I realize how he bore insult, shame r me—for me!—those hardest of things at which the ble soul revolts, and his was the soul of the highest ntleman the most noble man of history, I bow my ad and bend my knee in reverence for the character the Man. He is my Leader, my Hero. The blood rns at the thought of him; so young, so gallant, so adfast, so brave, so devoted, so deserted; treading e wine press alone. The mere thought of it wins en. "O," said Clovis, the king of the Salic Franks, hen he heard from a missionary the story of the Cross, d how Jesus was betrayed and abandoned by all, hat I had been there with my men-at-arms!"

When I ponder these things I begin to dream of the eatness of the Man, and that manhood evidences his odhead.

And, when I go further, when this manhood is so rried into my soul, I see something superhuman there, mething transcendent, something above and beyond e Man; when I hear him say quietly in words that are vful from their very calmness and love, this prayer, tween the brutal beats of the hammers as they drive ugh spikes through quivering hands and feet in those oments of agony, "Father, forgive them, for they know t what they do;" when I realize that that which we bear with fortitude if, or because, it is inevitable, he embraced from choice, in pure willingness of heart for you and me; when I know that at the breath of his nostrils that mob which poured curses and mockeries upon him in blasts of execration, might have been melted away had he willed it, I realize the courage of his forbearance, and that, for want of a better word we call his meekness, takes a new and brighter meaning. It seems to gather up all the qualities we rejoice to see in man or woman, in one radiant crown of Love Divine — and this Man seems never grander than when hanging on the Cross.

"Behold the Man," said Pilate, "Behold thy mother," said the Christ, but every incident in that mighty tragedy of life and death points us to a more powerful admonition and teaches a more imperative lesson. Each reviling passer-by, each mocking priest, each waiting soldier, each drop of blood staining the shuddering earth, says to us in words terrible, unmistakable, overwhelming, divine—"Behold thy God!"

The Supreme Example

Years ago I stood where many have stood and many yet shall stand, before the altar, to receive the laying on of hands in the sacred rite of Confirmation. The good Bishop whose face looks at me from out the darkness of the past, in his address to the class gave us these words of King David's for a life text. I know of none better. "I will go in the strength of the Lord God, I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only."

Let us take them to ourselves. Let us follow the Christ who is the hero and leader of men. Let us go forth in the strength of the Lord God to do and dare, as men sustained by him, for the cause of man. Sure one of the functions of every Christian is to show forth in his own person the manliness of Christ, to let the world know, to give it assurance, that to be a Christian is the most manly vocation for man.

By the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, through the love of God, in the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, let us, with courage and strength, oppose manhood and truth to falsehood and sham, to evil and shame, wherever they may present themselves, in society, in business, in religion, in life. So building up the Church, spreading the Gospel with the force and power and courage of Jesus the Hero, to whose greatest glory it may be said he was at once the servant and

The Saviour of Mankind

It may, it does look dark and gloomy, we can do so little, we are such poor instruments; sin, like a tidal wave; doubt, like the ocean deep, may threaten to overwhelm us and engulf us; our blows may have spent themselves upon the air of idle carelessness; or, with bleeding hands, we may strike and beat upon a wall of stony indifference—what of that? Strike on. So it has ever been in the world. Yet humanity sweeps onward, each day brings it nearer to God, each day makes more sure the great consummation. Do your part, your little part or great one, as it may be, with simplicity, without pretence, with love, courage, purpose, endurance, action—Christ's characteristics, these will tell. Follow his leading, though you may be taken upon a Calvary, and leave to God the rest. In the words of James Russell Lowell:

History's pages but record
One death grapple in the darkness,
'Twixt old systems and the Word;
Truth forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne:
Yet that scaffold sways the future,
And, from out the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the darkness,

LEARNED TO READ AT EIGHTY

A STRIKING example of the ancient saw, "It is never too late to learn," is presented in the case of Mrs. Jane Evans, of 99 Webster Street, New Haven, onn., who, at the probable age of eighty years, has just raduated from the elementary grade of the Hillhouse vening School.

Mrs. Evans is an ex-slave of the typical down-south rpe, and during the early years of her life she lived on plantation in Georgia. She was born and raised on ie plantation of Parnel Truet of Augusta, Ga., but the xact date of her birth is unknown to her. She is very ire that she is over eighty years of age, but she has no ay of proving it.

When, in response to the request of the Editor of THE HRISTIAN HERALD, the writer went to see Mrs. Evans, e found her reading Children's Stories of American rogress, which she received as a prize for excellent work n her school course. Mrs. Evans is one of the traditional turbaned aunties of before-the-war days. She peaks with the dialect of the Southern negro, she illustrates her remarks with the same gestures, is subject to he same superstitions as others of her race, and she is rone to show her religion by excited chanting and waving of arms. So much by way of introduction.

I shall now proceed to tell the story of Mrs. Evan's ife as she told it to me, bringing out her quaint expressions and portraying, as faithfully as possible, her character and superstitious nature.

When asked how she came to go to school at the age of eighty, Mrs. Evans said "Wal, erlong back when I war a chil', dey didn't have no schools fo' colord fo'ks, so I couldn't go to school. I war raised up in de house, an' I hed to sew and look after my mistis' clothes and sich. But I always wanted to know how to read an' write so as I cud read mah Bible. Wal, long 'bout 'mancipation time er white preacher come to our place, an' he tol' erbout an ole colored woman sixty odd years ole who learned how to read when she was ole lady, and he says as how she got so she could read fine an' was useful in de Sunday School. I set right in front o' him an' I looked right in his mout' when he said that, an' I made up my min' dat if that ole lady could be useful in Sunday School, and learn how to read and write, I cud do it, too. So I 'membered that, an' when I got my chillen raised up and I come North, I made up my min' to go to school and larn how to read. So when I was down in Pittsburg las' winter I went to school fer one month there. When I come to New Haven I didn't know whar de school was, but me daughter she done showed me, and I went in an' I says to de man, 'I's too old to go to school, aint I?' and he says, 'No! what's your name?' an' den he sent me into a room where there was a nice lady who was my teacher."

Mrs. Evans says that she has been to school five months and she has got so she can read most of the Bible, although there are a few words she cannot pronounce. She explains her success by saying, "When I do a thing, I do it. I ain't looking here and dere and everwhichaway. I's looking right here where de book is." She exhibits her book which she received as a prize, with a great deal of pride, and she spends most of her time reading that and her Bible.

MRS. EVANS READING IN HER GARDEN

Mrs. Evans is a very devout Baptist, and is at the present time a member of the Emanuel Baptist Church, of New Haven, of which the Rev. Mr. Powell is the pastor.

Mrs. Evans continued her story by saying: "Arter I done got religion, I had to be baptized. I had done a heap of sinnin' befo' I was baptized, as I was thirty-five years old, as near as I know, but I knew that my sins would all be washed away in de riber. So when it come June, I went to de Savannah riber with the rest of the people, an' de minister tuk an' soused me in de water, an' when I come out I was clean. Some of them fool women took on right smart an' swallowed the water, an' kicked an' screamed, but I jest thought of the Lord and held my breath."

In the summer, Mrs. Evans goes out to work as a cook, even though she is so old. She has never had a sick day in her life, and she has never had a doctor. She raised a family of three daughters, one of whom is in New Haven at the present time, and, strange as it may seem, mother and daughter attended the same school together, although they were in different classes.

After her baptism, Mrs. Evans joined the Henry Jackson Bapstist Church in Augusta, Ga., and was a member of that church twenty-five years; but when she came North she became separated from her church.

Mrs. Evans spoke of her old master and "mistis" with a great deal of affection, and she said that she was very sorry to leave them after the war was over. "We didn't know nothin' about carin' fer ourselves, an' we didn't want to go away from de old plantation. We hadn't seen nothin' of de war, an' we hadn't seen but a few soldiers."

This unique character is worthy one of James Whitcomb Riley's poems. She said that every person ought to believe in the Lord, for no one can ever tell when he or she is to be called.

This, in brief, is the story of a most interesting character, who combines qualities of determination, superstition, childishness and unwavering faith, in such a contradictory manner that one is continually surprised at the different phases shown. There is something almost childish about Mrs. Evans, and this illusion is completed when one reflects that at the age of eighty, the period of life which some look upon as a sort of second childhood, this old lady is studying the very elements of reading and writing, like a little child. She exhibits samples of her handwriting with great pride, and seems just as proud of her newly acquired knowledge as a little girl in school for the first time. This is one of a type of ex-slaves fast disappearing from the country, and with them is going much of the poetry and pathos of "the days-before-the-war."

WM. PICKETT.

Improve Your Talent

THE humble worker who responds to the Divine call to labor, may be sure of receiving heavenly inspiration and assistance. To bear so great a responsibility is in itself elevating to the character. We must answer for the talents that we have. The man to whom was given one talent, buried it; having the smallest gift, he left it unimproved. In this we are warned that, though our experience be small, yet we are not excused. In the Lord's test of character, he sees that the man to whom he gave one talent, would have failed, even though he had received five.

If we strive to improve our little experience, it will gradually increase. If your mind turns to mission work, study it; if it turns to home and family duties, study these; if your heart aches to teach the children, to speak to the little urchins in the street, who have never understood what the true Way is—make it a point not to put off in the mistaken notion that it will come more easily later, but get about it at once. Start now, and improve the talent Christ has given you. It may be that if you look, you will find that you have more talents that one. At the Master's coming, many talents will be hidden, and many a poor soul will bitterly regret that he let his first light go out and his first opportunities pass away forever.

The Resurrection of Miss Cynthia

By FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

CHAPTER I.

MISS CYNTHIA DAY had lain broadly awake on her smooth, lavender-scented pillow since the first gray twilight of dawn, her thoughts busying themselves fretfully with the events of the previous day.

The events in question appeared conspicuously important to Miss Cynthia. For one thing, she had visited her dressmaker and found the fit and finish of her new silk gown entirely unsatisfactory. This was a regular annual occurrence, and therefore quite to be expected, but Miss Cynthia had not found it the less irritating on that account. She had entered upon the customary discussion of remedial measures with Malvina Bennett, with a suppressed exasperation which bordered upon vulgar ill-humor. The stupidity and incompetence of Miss Bennett appeared almost criminal when considered in conjunction with the shining breadths of silk intrusted to her hands.

"Malvina is not to be trusted," Miss Cynthia told herself, with a firm tightening of her small mouth.

Dismissing for the moment the professional peccadillos of the dressmaker, Miss Cynthia entered upon an exhaustive mental inspection of her wardrobe, in the course of which she decided to purchase "a really good tailor-made dress" in one of the big department stores of Boston. It was to be feared that this expenditure (necessitated by Malvina Bennett's inexcusable carelessness), might carry her perilously near the rigid bound of her self-imposed allowance. Miss Cynthia knew, of course, that the income from the accumulated Breyfogle and Day properties was more than amply sufficient for her needs. She was also complacently aware that only quite common and vulgar persons (notably devoid of ancestors) expended all they could conveniently lay hands upon; conversely, the less of an ample income one employed, the more dignified and well-bred the individual.

Such elective and therefore patrician economies had invariably distinguished the members of the Breyfogle family. Miss Cynthia had early acquired the conviction that she was not an exception to the rule. She reflected that it was hardly necessary to impress the advantage of frugality upon Abby Whiton. Abby had lived in the family as maid of all work for more than thirty years, and was thoroughly conversant with the Breyfogle methods of administering a kitchen. Nevertheless, Miss Cynthia decided to look a little more carefully after the soap and drippings. There were certain other snug retrenchments which she contemplated, with a satisfaction which for the moment cleared the anxious puckers from her small, colorless face.

The tailor-made gown should, of course, be black. Miss Cynthia had worn black continuously since the days of her young girlhood, when the successive funerals of a large and elderly family connection had occurred with monotonous frequency. "I despise black clothes!" she had once declared rebelliously, thereby shocking the surviving elderly relatives into an unending series of dreary homilies, which she had found even more depressing than the hated black dresses.

Miss Cynthia scarcely ever thought of her shadowy young self now-a-days; when she did it was with a feeling of quiet satisfaction in the changes which the passing years had wrought. The last funeral had occurred more than five years since; there was, therefore, no mortuary reason (as Malvina Bennett had frequently urged) to prevent Miss Cynthia from wearing colors. But she still chose the handsome black gowns which intimated not too obtrusively her lone condition in the world, wearing them with a certain pride in her loyalty to the unyielding customs and opinions of her dead mother.

Mrs. Day had been the last to join the silent company in the family burial-plot, and the gloom of her austere, hard-featured personality seemed still to linger like an actual presence about the stiffly furnished rooms of the old Breyfogle house. Miss Cynthia was acutely aware of it, and she had continued to yield to it an unquestioned obedience down to the smallest details of her small round of daily existence. She was anxiously careful of her clothes, of her expenditures, of her weak health, of her religious beliefs, and she had become increasingly solicitous in her efforts to preserve the grim, immaculate order of furniture and fittings in which the late Mrs. Day had taken what might be termed her one pleasure in life if words so warm and human may be used to describe an emotion so frozen, so colorless.

The small, uneven trickle of Miss Cynthia's thoughts mounted at length to the level of the attic, where at the bottom of a certain hair trunk, sacred to the memory of her Grandfather Breyfogle, reposed several neatly labeled boxes of hereditary dress-trimmings. She wondered with feverish intensity whether a set of jet medallions (carefully wrapped in tissue-paper and bestowed in the lower left-hand corner of the green box) would be too "dressy" a garniture for the front of her new silk waist. The jets would partially conceal, she reflected, the ravages of Malvina Bennett's unthinking needle. On the other hand, the medallions had once belonged to her Grandmother Breyfogle; her mother, she remembered, had always considered them too handsome and too expensive to use. Miss Cynthia finally rejected the idea of the medallions in favor of some well-mended black lace, at present doing duty on a best dress about to be degraded to second wear.

FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

The author of the brilliant Serial which is begun in this week's CHRISTIAN HERALD, is already favorably known to a large majority of our readers, through her charming story, The Needle's Eye, which appeared in this journal three years ago, and also through occasional contributions. She is also the author of Titus (1894); Stephen (1896); Paul (1897); Prisoners of the Sea (1898); The Cross Triumphant (1899); The Transfiguration of Miss Philura (1901); Under the Stars (1903); The Singular Miss Smith, and other stories which have won her fame and popularity. The Resurrection of Miss Cynthia is the ripest product of her genius, and by far the most charming story that has yet come from her versatile pen.

The vision of the hair trunk had subtly suggested the annual spring house-cleaning. It was already April, and Miss Cynthia had not cleaned house. She fidgeted uneasily upon her pillow as she called to mind her mother's spare, active figure in grim pursuit of imaginary dust and cobwebs amid the rigors of March weather. To clean house at a season of the year involving positive personal suffering had appealed to the martyr spirit which dominated Mrs. Day's New England conscience. In view of the strenuous past, Miss Cynthia experienced a real and poignant remorse at the thought of her own sinful laxness.

A certain dull, teasing, persistent little pain which had haunted her of late, made itself felt more sharply than usual, as if offering itself in guise of a more or less valid excuse. Miss Cynthia turned on her pillow with a sigh, and the movement brought into the range of her short-sighted blue eyes a flat thin book with marbled board covers, which lay upon the table in close proximity to her Bible. It was, in fact, the official record of minutes of the "Ladies' Aid and Missionary Society" of the Innisfield Presbyterian Church, of which Miss Cynthia was a member in good and regular standing.

At a meeting of the society held the previous afternoon, Miss Day had been unanimously elected secretary, in place of Mrs. John Puffer, resigned. The newly-elected officer had become almost immediately aware that Mrs. Puffer's book of records was in a disgracefully untidy condition. It was, indeed, actually moist and sticky. Miss Cynthia had grave reason to suspect that the Puffer twins had recently consumed bread and jam in its immediate proximity. To be sure, the biennial new baby had but lately arrived in the Puffer household, a fact which had been duly advanced by a sympathetic matron to account for the resignation before noted and other phenomena, including bread and jam, in unlooked-for localities.

Miss Cynthia's maiden imagination hovered in wordless indignation about the Puffer menage for a brief space, then reverted to her own more engrossing affairs. She consulted her Grandmother Breyfogle's watch, which ticked feebly in its thin, pale case beneath her pillow. "I think," she said aloud, "that I shall go to town to-day."

She continued to plan the details of a somewhat tedious shopping expedition as she completed her toilet, selecting each garment with careful reference to the capricious April morning which gloomed and sparkled outside the closed sash of her window. A robin in full tide of jubilant mating song swung in the budding branches of the old apple-tree in the garden below. Violets were unfolding their young leaves from the cold, wet earth. An adventurous daffodil flaunted its yellow skirts in the brisk wind. Miss Cynthia's faded blue eyes were riveted upon the open page of her Bible. "A broadcloth is far handsomer than a serge," she was thinking; "but it does not wear nearly as well."

"Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord;" she read, and wondered if fringes were still worn, and if they were less expensive than applique. She sank to her knees and repeated certain familiar prayers in a busy whisper. When she arose she had decided to purchase a serge, with stitched taffeta trimmings.

This and other matters were presently noted in due order upon a neat tablet of memoranda. As Miss Cynthia's pencil primly dotted the last period, the teasing, familiar pain again clamored sharply for recognition beneath the stiff trimmings of her rigid little bodice. She hesitated for the fraction of a minute, then added a line to her list: "If in neighborhood of Plymouth Street, consult the doctor."

"I suppose it will be a foolish waste of money," she thought, as she stepped noiselessly down the thickly-carpeted stair. This prudent reflection concerned itself directly with the projected call at the doctor's office. Miss Cynthia was thoroughly accustomed to slight, dull pains in various parts of her body, and these, with the sense of lassitude which frequently overtook her of late, she was in the habit of referring to the "delicate health," which all ladylike persons, particularly of the Breyfogle connection, cherished as an integral element of their genteel breeding. Miss Cynthia had already experienced a large number of interesting maladies, and these, with the differing complaints of various friends and relatives, had furnished her with much food for thought, as well as for conversation of a gentle and desultory character.

Miss Cynthia invariably referred to the "Breyfogle constitution" with a sort of reverence, as to something rare and precious which had been bequeathed to her by a singularly fortunate and distinguished ancestry. There was also the intricate "Day constitution" to be taken into account. Miss Cynthia vaguely recollected that her great-aunt, Serena Day, had frequently complained of a sensation similar to the one with which she herself was growing unhappily familiar. Involuntarily her fragile little hand sought the unyielding perpendicular of her corset-steel with the gesture of the long departed Aunt Serena. "It is just here," whispered Miss Cynthia to herself; "and it goes through like a red-hot knitting-needle." This had been Aunt Serena Day's picturesquely dreadful descriptive phrase. Miss Cynthia adopted it with peculiar satisfaction. "Just like a red-hot knitting-needle!" she repeated, as she stepped from the last stair.

here was a lonesome, penetrating sell of well-rubbed, heavily-upholstered old furniture and carpets, religiously preserved from the direct rays of the sun, in the lower regions of the house, which might have suggested hastily opened doors and windows to a less conservative person. Miss Cynthia was hardly aware of it; her delicate little pointed nose (the Breyfogle nose) recognized merely the familiar hereditary atmosphere, as thoroughly characteristic, and quite as much a matter of course as the orthodox family opinions on other things.

She paused on the threshold of the parlor, wondering weakly whether it would do to leave the carpets down for another season. "No one ever comes in here to sit down, except when the minister calls," she told herself. The stern, wooden countenance of Grandfather Breyfogle, in gown and bands, and the prim, simpering glance of Grandmother Breyfogle (wearing the jet medallions), seemed to focus a strong family disapproval upon her slinking little figure, as she raised her eyes timidly to their tarnished gilt frames, swathed funereally in yellow tarlatan.

"Of course," she murmured apologetically, "I shall try to do my duty."

This stern, but depressing, resolution remained with Miss Cynthia during the entire day. One's duty, as she conceived it, being invariably at odds with one's inclination, she purchased a frankly ugly gown and an unfashionable hat, lunched dyspeptically on lemon pie and weak tea, and finally found herself waiting her turn for an interview with the silent, melancholy assemblage of persons usually to be found in a doctor's reception-room.

The doctor was a big, bluff, red-faced man, with a certain defiant cheerfulness of manner. He prided himself on the fact that he never prevaricated facts pertaining to life and death, for the benefit of his patient's supposed sensibilities. He regarded the human body as a vastly complicated and interesting machine, inviting, but seldom receiving, the most careful and systematic attention from its owner. He was frequently incensed with the silly women who came to him to be rid of their self-induced complaints, and he made little effort to conceal his feelings.

He stared keenly at Miss Cynthia when she had seated herself in his presence, with a timidly ingratiating air. "Yes," he said shortly, after she had spoken with becoming dignity of the exceeding delicacy of the Breyfogle constitution and of the intricate and uncommon maladies incident to the family constitution. "I remember both you and your folks very well indeed. Heard your Grandfather Breyfogle preach on hell when I was a boy." He made a wry face at this, as if unexpectedly compelled to swallow a dose of his own medicine. "Haven't been to church since." After a thoughtful pause he added abruptly. "Hope you haven't inherited his insides, my dear madam."

Miss Cynthia compressed her small mouth. "I am said to be very like my Grandfather Breyfogle," she said primly.

The doctor busied himself with listening intently at the back and front of Miss Day's attenuated little figure. "Humph!" he ejaculated. "How old are you?"

Miss Cynthia hesitated for the fraction of a second. "I am thirty-three," she said in a low voice.

"I should have said ten years older," commented the doctor, with professional rudeness. "Well, it doesn't matter."

Miss Cynthia stared at him with vague dismay. "I thought perhaps I needed a—a tonic," she said at last. "Something bitter, or——. I have taken six bottles of Scoop's Vegetable Herb Compound since last fall," she added somewhat proudly. "It was recommended to me."

The doctor shook his head compassionately. "You should have attended to this before," he said slowly. He squared his broad shoulders; then broke into a short, impatient laugh. "About a hundred years before," he added, under his breath.

"What—what do you call my complaint?" inquired Miss Cynthia. "Do you—consider- it serious?"

"Do you want me to tell you the truth?"

"That is why I came to you," she said. She sat quite erect in the straight-backed chair, her little feet scarce touching the floor, her blue eyes fixed on the doctor's face. "I shall be obliged to you," she added with careful dignity, "if you will acquaint me with my exact condition. It is, I think, more important to me than to—anyone. There is no one else to whom it matters."

Miss Cynthia's erect little figure did not waver during the somewhat halting explanation which made her grim future clear to her. Her hands, folded primly in her lap, did not tremble. "I shall live—only one year," she said slowly. "That is what I understand—one year. Am I right?"

The doctor's big face had grown pale, almost ashamed. "I—I am sorry," he stammered, with a curious embarrassment. "Perhaps I should not have told you so—er—plainly. But——"

Miss Cynthia arose with a certain definiteness of manner. "I am glad I know," she said simply. "I—thank you for telling me. It was right that I should know."

"I NEVER RAN DOWN HILL BEFORE!" GASPED MISS CYNTHIA

CHAPTER II.

THE late afternoon sunshine flickered coldly across the grim headstones which marked the last resting-place of Samuel Hastings Day and Susan Maria Breyfogle, his wife. To Cynthia, stumbling weakly through the sodden grass, they appeared in stony guise of her parents, waiting stiffly and with inexorable patience for her to join them.

She remembered dully that they had always waited for her thus. After church of a summer's evening, when other girls were loitering happily homeward arm in arm with the red-cheeked village beaux, she had walked primly between her father and mother, listening to the endless antiphonal discourses with which they strove to seal her young ears against the allurements of the world. Thus early had she been led to differentiate between the inordinate desires of the carnal, or fleshly, nature and the unyielding demands of deity.

The conscientious Mrs. Day had earnestly striven to bring up her one child in what she was pleased to term "the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" the worthy woman's interpretation of this Scriptural phrase being at once simple and ingenuous. The resulting discipline consisted mainly in ascertaining the natural desires of the girl's heart for the purpose of thwarting them.

Once a courageous youth had ventured to walk home with Cynthia Day from school, leaving her at the gate with a lingering hand-clasp, which Mrs. Day, at the window above, witnessed with tightened lips. The girl had gone into the house, her face bright with youthful blushes, to endure the cold displeasure of her mother's eyes. "I do not approve of boys," Mrs. Day had announced with a withering accent of finality. "I can't allow you to have anything to do with boys."

But the boy had continued to defy the disapproval of the matron. Miss Cynthia drew her breath sharply as she thought of him now. It was in such young April weather as this that she had said good-bye to him for the last time. Perhaps he had not really cared. Perhaps he had forgotten. She had never known. It was, after all, only the pale shadow of a love affair; but she remembered it with singular vividness as she stood looking down at the narrow, sunken space between the graves. This was her place, reserved for her. And she was coming to it—soon.

She sank weakly down on the iron bench, set for the cold comfort of mourners, mechanically lifting her black skirt from contact with the ground. "My stone will stand just there," she said aloud, pointing with her tremulous little finger. "It will be white and new. It will say, 'Cynthia Breyfogle Day, aged thirty-four. Only daughter of Samuel Hastings Day and Susan Maria Breyfogle, his wife. Died April ——'"

She broke off with a short, sharp cry of utter rebellion. "I can't die! Oh God! I can't die!"

A bluebird perched on the fence near-by burst into a low gurgle of happiness, the blossoming maples tossed their scarlet fringes against the darkening sky. Miss Cynthia had slipped from the iron bench and lay in a huddled heap upon the wet earth, where the new grass was pricking greenly through the year's dead growth. She was sobbing wildly like a hurt child. "I've always tried to do just what you wanted me to," she whispered, "and now—and now it's almost over!"

She realized as she lay there prone against the unanswering stone—something of the pitiful futility of her life, something of its starved littleness. She wondered dully why she had lived at all. Why—having lived uselessly—she must die unsatisfied.

"I don't want to die!" she whimpered childishly, "I don't want to die!

"I should like," she murmured, "to have people think that somebody loved me once." She lay quite still after this, wrapped in a dim dream of the long, peaceful days, when the stone would be telling its brief story, and she—would be sleeping beneath it.

A drop of warm rain, shed like a tear from a great hurrying cloud, fell gently against her wan cheek. "The beloved daughter," whispered Miss Cynthia, smiling piteously to herself. "They will think, perhaps, that I loved somebody—once."

The prattle of shrill, childish voices close at hand mingled confusedly with her dream. It seemed to her that she was once more a child, hungrily watching other children at play across the hedge. Her mother's voice was calling insistently, "Come, daughter! You must come in now; it is time to go to bed."

"Yes, mother," she answered drowsily, "I'm coming!"

She rose stiffly to her feet, dimly conscious that the rain was falling steadily, with a soft patter, on the gaunt stones and leafless shrubbery. A pink and yellow sunset shot long, dazzling beams through the warm mist. The friendly bluebird, perched on the topmost twig of a tall evergreen, repeated his rapturous exclamation again and again. A red-breasted robin darted through the chill, wet air, with loud cheerful calls to his flying mate. Miss Cynthia felt strangely young and light of heart as she walked slowly among the graves. "Why, it it's beautiful!" she said in a surprised little voice.

She almost stumbled over two small figures cuddled snugly under the shelter of an overhanging bush. She stopped and regarded them attentively. They stared back at her from innocent wide eyes. "It's raining," said Miss Cynthia, with a vague smile. "You will be quite wet if you stop here."

"We don't care," piped a little voice; "we like to be out in the rain. 'Sides, there's goin' to be a rainbow. We like rainbows."

"But why did you come here?" asked Miss Cynthia, slowly recognizing the Puffer twins. They wore no hats, and their red hair stood out in a sort of aureole about their round, freckled faces.

"Because it's a hill," answered the child promptly. "We always come up here to see rainbows. What did you come for?"

Miss Cynthia lifted her wan face to the shining sky. "I came to see a rainbow," she answered. "Yes, that is why I came to see a rainbow."

"You're getting pretty wet," observed one of the little girls, after a wondering silence. "Why do you stay here and get wet?"

Miss Cynthia laughed weakly. "I never got wet before in my life," she said. "I think—I like it."

The child stared hard at the little draggled figure. "I guess we'll go now," she said at last. "P'raps you'd better come too. Do you want to take hold of han's?"

"Yes," said Miss Cynthia, eagerly, "I'd like to take hold of hands."

"We most always run when we take hold of han's," piped up the other child, with a twittering laugh. "It's lots of fun if you don't fall down an' skin your knee. I guess you can't run very fast, though."

The soft, warm hands of the two children seemed to send thrills of a strange new life into Miss Cynthia's chilled body. She found herself presently at the foot of the little slope, panting and breathless. It occurred to her that she had just passed through the most exciting experience of her life. "I never ran down hill before," she gasped.

The Philosophy of the Revival

ONE word is the key given to the mystery of the outbreak of the Revival that is sweeping over Wales from one end to the other. That word is Self-effacement. Evan Roberts himself gives that explanation. Journalists like W. T. Stead, who have gone to Wales to witness the manifestation, reach the same conclusion by elaborate analysis. Ministers and devout Christians who approach the subject from a sympathetic standpoint, can account for it in no other way. "This is the Lord's work and it is marvelous in our eyes." The leaders declare emphatically that they make no preparation, have no order or system, and organize no plans of conducting the services. They hold themselves at the Lord's behest, and are simply doing his will as they understand it.

Some have tried to put an occult meaning on this avowal; but there is no real ground for it. God is working on the hearts of men as he worked at Pentecost, and at subsequent revivals. The fruits are the same. Men turn from their sins to serve him. The instruments of the work are simple, untutored men. Evan Roberts declares that the words he speaks are not his own, but are suggested to him by the Holy Spirit. At the beginning of the revival he shrank from speaking. He was not a preacher, though he was preparing to enter the ministry. But he had the assurance in his heart that God would use him, and in the strength of that assurance he began his work. Out of the fulness of his heart he told the story of Calvary, and pleaded with Christians to become earnest in seeking the salvation of souls. "Revivalism," he says, "is only Christianity in earnest." It was a simple message, and he believes it was dictated by the Holy Spirit. That seems to be a fact, for no other explanation explains the astonishing results. God is speaking through him, and his merit consists in effacing himself, and contenting himself with delivering the message given to him.

But will the results of the movement be permanent? It is feared by some that they will be ephemeral. "Well," says an observer, "apple blossoms are ephemeral; they fall, but apples are born from them." So it may be with these converts. They may lose some of the ecstacy and the exuberance of feeling, but the change in their lives will continue. Already the mine owners are talking of the better work the men are doing; of the cessation of idleness and waste; of the discontinuance of drinking and profanity. These are not trifling matters. They show that the work has gone into their lives. What other power is there known to philosophers that could produce these results, than that by which the revivalists explain it? "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

Gifts to the Church

IN spite of the old proverb which enjoins us not to "look a gift horse in the mouth," most of us will confess to a certain degree of admiration for the course of those Massachusetts Congregational ministers who have openly protested against the acceptance, by the American Board of Foreign Missions, of a contribution of $100,000 for the Lord's work, because it comes from a source of which their consciences cannot approve. There is something so Spartan-like and unselfish in this act, dictated doubtless by rigid adherence to high principle, that it must command respect even from those who may hold a totally different opinion. Apart altogether from the particular case in question, it emphasizes a moral principle, which, in these days of large gifts to religious causes, is too apt to be overlooked.

Several years ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's readers discussed at great length in these pages, the question whether the Church should or should not take cognizance of the character of the sources from which contributions for its spiritual work were derived. There were many who contended, on the one hand, that money originally obtained by improper or unrighteous means, or through any calling which was opposed to the material or spiritual welfare of society, should not be received; that such gifts were "tainted," and that only those offerings which were "without spot or blemish" could be acceptably devoted to the Lord's work. On the other hand, there were those who argued that the end sanctified the means; that money itself carried no taint, and that the fact that any one, however great a sinner, had been moved to contribute to the Church, was in itself sufficient evidence of the giver's sincerity to warrant acceptance.

In its final analysis, the whole matter resolves itself into a question of conscience. If a Church, after giving the subject full consideration, can find no reasonable justification for refusing a voluntary offering, it is clearly right in accepting the same. If, however, it is evident that the gift proceeds from an unworthy source—as from one living in open and flagrant defiance of moral and statute law, and whose acts are dishonest, immoral, unjust and abhorrent to all right-thinking people—such a gift cannot be regarded as tendered from a pure and worthy motive. If it be the profits of an evil calling, or given as a bribe for religious recognition, or to seal the Church's lips and prevent denunciation of certain social iniquities; or if the donor has any other purpose than the glory of God and a sincere desire for the extension of his Kingdom on earth, the gift should find no place in the Lord's treasury.

"Ye cannot serve God and mammon," is as true today as when the Church's Divine Founder uttered the words upon the Mount. The message of that first Christian sermon indicated the great struggle in which the Church is now involved. Every thoughtful Christian recognizes the danger of adopting a policy which might yield step by step, until the vital principle is sacrificed and the Church is subsidized by the rich. Should that day ever come, the Church will have lost its spirituality and sunk to a condition of hopeless inefficiency for its high and holy mission.

But it should not be forgotten that we are not, after all, the appointed spiritual judges of our brother-men. Many a sinner, whose gifts to the Church come from deep conviction and a sincere desire to have a share in the Lord's work, would be deterred from all religious connection, were human judgment to be applied unreservedly. Public clamor, too, is an unsafe guide, more frequently wrong than right, and no Church should be swayed by it. God alone knoweth the heart. We should be ready at all times to extend to others who may be assailed, the benefit of the doubt. It would be obviously impracticable for a Church to scrutinize every gift, to attempt to penetrate every motive. Let us, therefore, be generous in our judgment of the actions and motives of others, lest in judging them, we heap the greater condemnation upon ourselves.

Should Women Wear Hats in Church?

AT the suggestion of the pastor of Trinity Methodist Church, Denver, Colo., the women of his congregation now remove their hats and bonnets during service. On a recent Sunday forenoon, the Rev. Wm. Potts George, the pastor, merely by way of suggestion, referred to the desirability of such an innovation. Many ladies in the audience, we learn, "signified their approval of the idea by removing their headdress, and soon every woman present was hatless, and so remained throughout the service." Furthermore, after the service, the ladies met informally, and decided to encourage their sisters in Denver's other churches to adopt the custom.

That the new departure in which the Coloradan city has set the example, will extend to other cities in the West is by no means improbable. Its progress and development will be watched with keen interest by women generally, but it is less likely to secure a foothold in the East and South, without considerable opposition. Old ways and long cherished usage are not easily thrown aside, and we can readily believe that there are many women who will regard the change as radical.

Yet, why should it be so regarded? At the opera, the concert, and high social functions, the absence of the customary headgear is universal. At many of our great religious convocations, where thousands are assembled to worship and to praise, the wearing of hats is the exception rather than the rule; and the change is a welcome one for many reasons. We believe it would be equally welcome in our churches.

Should the ladies wear hats in church, or not? This is the question concerning which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be pleased to know the opinions of its readers who have given any thought to the matter. Though not a problem of the first magnitude, still it is one that affects all classes and all denominations. If the Denver idea is a good one—unobjectionable and conducive to general comfort—it deserves to be adopted everywhere. On the other hand, if it be really undignified for a woman to sit hatless or bonnetless in church, and especially if such an innovation would divert attention from the sacred duties of the hour, then it should be negatived firmly and effectually.

In any event, discussion will clear the atmosphere and we shall know more about the merits and the disadvantages of the idea after we have learned what our friends think of it. We therefore invite all to send us their views on the overshadowing feminine hat question frankly stated, and not exceeding one hundred words for publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN have recently conducted successful union revival meetings in Fort Scott, Kan., and are now engaged in large union meetings at Fairmont, Minn.

—STAFF CAPTAIN KEMP, of the Salvation Army and his revival brigade have just closed a wonderful revival in the First Congregational Church, at Bayshore, L. I. Nearly two hundred confessed Christ.

—THE HELPING HAND LEAGUE of Cedar Rapids, Ia., is an energetic and progressive organization, and is doing excellent work. It is making an effort to establish a National Rescue Home for Girls, to cost some $15,000.

REV. F. B. MEYER, of London, will spend two months in America. He will visit Atlanta, Ga., and then Los Angeles and San Diego, Calif., spending April on the Pacific Coast. From May 4 to 7 he will be in Dayton, O.

—EX-PRESIDENT CLEVELAND was among those who wrote congratulatory letters to Fanny Crosby, the blind hymn-writer, on the recent occasion of her eighty-fifth birthday. He was connected officially with the New York Institute for the Blind many years ago, when Miss Crosby was one of the teachers there.

—FOR THE LAST two years, at this season, Christian people in the United States and Canada have united in a week of special prayer for missions abroad. The Annual Conference of the Foreign Missions Boards of the Presbyterian Church, meeting in New York in January, decided to repeat the request for these united intercessions during the week beginning April 16 and closing April 23, 1905. The topics for which prayer is most desired are these: For missionaries and the native churches in foreign lands; for reinforcements; for the return of peace in Asia, and for religious liberty; for the extinction of slavery in Africa, and for justice in the Congo State; for the spread of the Gospel in South America; for the triumph of Christianity in the islands of the sea, and for the arousing of the church at home from its lethargy and indifference.

BROCKTON'S FATAL DISASTER

HORRIBLE beyond description are the details of the recent disaster at Brockton, Mass. By the explosion of a boiler on March 20, fifty-eight persons lost their lives and more than fifty were seriously injured. The boiler was used in the shoe factory of R. B. Grover and Co., in which about four hundred operatives were employed. As the engineer and other officers are believed to be among the dead, the actual cause of the disaster cannot be positively explained, but the present belief is that it was due to a pressure of steam on the boiler in excess of its capacity. It is stated that early in the morning a fire was built under an old boiler which had not been used before this winter. There was a new boiler in the factory, but for some unknown reason it was not used. About half an hour later there was an ominous roar. The huge boiler rose vertically crashing through the factory, and then taking a horizontal course passed through an adjacent house, tearing off its roof, and landing on another house two hundred feet from the factory, and demolishing it. The factory, which occupied three sides of a hollow square, was a wooden structure, one wing of which fell in utter ruin. Its heavy machinery and stout beams fell on the workers and pinned them among the debris. Before they could be released, fire broke out and burned fiercely, spreading to the other wings of the building. Brave rescuers went to the relief of the imprisoned people, whose shrieks, as they saw the flames approaching them, were heartrending. Many were rescued; but those who were under the heavy beams or the machines, could not be liberated. Again and again rescuing bands made the attempt, only to be driven back by the heat and smoke. The fire gathered strength as it spread and in spite of the efforts of the firemen, raged unsubdued and attacked houses on the opposite side of the street. It was not before noon that the fire had burned out sufficiently to allow of a search for the dead. The distress among the relatives as the bodies were brought out was sad to witness. They must have felt then how trivial were all worldly concerns compared with the crucial question whether their loved ones were with Christ.

The righteous hath hope in his death (Prov. 14 : 32).

Venezuela Defiant

Positive refusal has been given by President Castro, of Venezuela, to the demand of the United States that the questions in dispute between the two governments be submitted to arbitration. He has done this in the face of the warning delivered by Mr. Bowen, the American Minister at Caracas, that unless he consented to arbitration the United States Government would feel called upon to take its own course. His answer, too, was couched in terms impertinent, insolent and defiant. He has also disregarded the protests of our government against a plan he has adopted for the settlement of the claims of other Powers against Venezuela. He is in difficulty with Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Belgium and Holland, who all have claims against him. He negotiated an arrangement with Great Britain and Germany, by which they were to receive one-half the customs receipts of every port except two, in Venezuela. This arrangement was designed to make those two nations preferred creditors, and so secure their assistance in fighting off the other creditors. Our government protested against the plan as being an unfair and unjust arrangement, but Castro ignored the protest and has signed the treaty. The act is regarded as specially ungrateful, because Cleveland, when President, championed his cause against England. It is believed that he was encouraged to take this defiant course by the action of our Senate in the San Domingo matter, which he regards as a proof that President Roosevelt would not have the support of the country in an attempt to punish him. He may be right in that belief; but he is certainly unwise in alienating a government that would be his best friend and protector. It is unfortunate for Venezuela that it has so foolish a ruler.

Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish (Ps. 49 : 20).

Desertions from the Navy

A writer in one of our leading journals explains some of the reasons which are causing the wholesale desertions from the navy that are puzzling the government. He contends that it is not on account of harsh treatment or of a too rigid discipline that the men desert, but because there is not sufficient care in the first instance in the enlistment of the men. The principal method of recruiting, he says, is the exhibition in Western country towns and villages of alluring and gaudily colored posters to impose on the simplicity and credulity of the unwary farm boy, a prize in his proper element, but on board a ship not only unornamental, but useless. These posters are more than seductive morsels for the average country boy, for they present an elaborate description of "life on the ocean wave," with all its glories and pleasant features, promise trips to foreign shores at Uncle Sam's expense, and the privilege of a furlough at the end of the first six months' cruise. The result is the collection of a number of boys unaccustomed to the use of the machinery of a modern warship, and by nature and habit attached to the fields and the work of the farm. One voyage is generally enough to disgust them with the life that was so attractively described on the posters, and as soon as they return to American soil, they take the first opportunity of deserting. Those who enter the service of Christ can never complain that they were deceived. He was explicit as to the trials and the reward.

In this world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world (John 14: 33).

A Nurse's Self-Sacrifice

The epidemic of cerebro-spinal meningitis, which is proving fatal to so many of New York's citizens, proves to be infectious. The fact was demonstrated by the death of a prominent physician, who had taken charge of many hospital patients afflicted with the disease. There is now a new victim. A nurse attached to the Metropolitan Hospital was seized recently with the malady, which she contracted while nursing the sufferers brought to the hospital. There were fifteen of them under treatment, and as the disease was suspected of being infectious, the other nurses were reluctant to attend to them. This nurse, therefore, said she would take charge of them all. The physicians urged her not to undertake so extensive and dangerous a duty, but she said that one of the nurses would have to look after them and that she might as well be the one, as it came within her line of duty. In about ten days she developed symptoms of the disease, and she was unable to attend to her duties. She grew rapidly worse, and on Friday she was transferred to a hospital as a patient, and it was soon found that her condition was hopeless. She grew rapidly worse and died. It is sad that a woman so noble should be lost to the world, but so it has ever been with those who think of others more than of themselves. It is such that the world honors and God rewards.

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends (John 15: 13).

BRIEF NOTES

The whole world will be grieved to learn that the famous hospice of St. Gothard on the Alps, has been destroyed by fire.

The Baptist chapel on "Emmanuel," under the care of Mr. Hammiston, has become the centre of a splendid work in Rev. Bud Col., where a champion prize-fighter and saloon-keeper was converted, closed his saloon, and is now actively engaged in helping in Gospel work.

The United States Treasury has received $12,000 from [illegible] who defrauded the Government some years ago of $5,000. He writes: "I am now paying fourfold in accordance with the teachings of Scripture. The way of the transgressor is hard, and no one knows God knows how I have suffered the consequences, and I would like to do bountiful restitution. May God pardon where the United States Government is benefited."

THE FRAGRANCE OF LOVING DEEDS

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THIS scene at Bethany, and another previous, naturally go together, like two lithographic stones that put variety of color into the same picture. Both of them present the poetic Mary in contrast to the practical Martha — in this case, in contrast also to the practical apostles. When Jesus came, on a former occasion, to Bethany, as a friendly retreat from the criticism and conflict of his life in Jerusalem, Martha left him, after a word of welcome, and hastened to her kitchen to prepare many delicacies for him. What Jesus wanted most was not a feast, but companionship and sympathy, which Mary instinctively recognized, and she also craved Christ's fellowship above everything else, and so she sat at his feet to feed upon his wonderful words. Martha complained of this, and would have taken away Mary also, and left Christ alone, while they stewed over superfluous dishes. He replied, in substance, "Martha, you are kindly planning to give me many kinds of food, instead of yourself. One dish is enough, and Mary has chosen the better plan, to give herself to her guest." Possibly Mary needed to be developed on the practical side. Certainly, Martha greatly needed to learn that noble sentiments are better than any condiments. No doubt, in the scene of this lesson, she shared with the apostles the feeling, voiced by Judas, that the outpouring upon Christ of ointment, representing a year's wages, was a great "waste." Thus, in all ages a majority of men, and many women also, underrate what Christ prizes above everything else, the outpouring of the heart's affection.

ANCIENT ALABASTER VASES

The best explanation and analysis of this lesson that we have seen was made by Henry Ward Beecher, a master of sentiment, in the following words:

"Anointing was employed in the Orient for several purposes: first for pleasure, it being a great luxury in that climate. Ointments were prepared from oils with great difficulty. They represented the very best fragrance which could be compounded. They were used by a person upon himself; and it was a significant gift of esteem when ointment was presented by friend to friend. Ointments were also used in the coronation, and I might say ordination, of 'kings and priests;' and so they came to signify sacredness through reverence. Ointments were further used in the burial of the dead, and so came to signify the sorrow of love. But in every case, whether for gifts or for pleasure, or for sacred uses of consecration or burial, it was not the intrinsic value of the ointment, but the thought which went with it, which gave it significance. It represented deep heart feeling; loyalty; deep religious consecration; sorrow and hope.

"Looking at this act from the standpoint of the actor, it is one which is remarkably interpretive of the soul's operation in those who are oppressed with a burden of feeling. She had beheld the Saviour; and his personal nature was such as to draw those who had the worship of the heroism of purity in them. She had seen him both in the hours of sorrow and in the hours of joy, both as a worker of miracles and as a teacher of the people; and also as a friend in the domestic cirle—a sphere of Christ's life that has been very little explored, but which must have been wonderfully rich and beautiful.

"She was evidently one of those persons that have very little language of the tongue. Not all birds can sing. She could not with eloquent tongue respond to him, nor recite how he had aroused in her a new and deeper life. There come hours to those who are richly endowed when their deepest thoughts must at last rain out. As clouds hanging for days and days in the atmosphere, and doing nothing, at last gather themselves together, and pour down refreshing showers; so there are persons of natures rich and strong, who patiently await the gathering of sentiment in their souls. There must be some outlet at last; and if it cannot be in language it must be by deed.

"This woman was modest and retiring; yet in the presence of this great company she undertook to express her silent adoration and love by unstopping the vase of precious ointment, and pouring it upon the head of the Christ. No being can tell what Jesus had been to her. He had exalted the ideal of her life; and a greater gift than that cannot be conferred. He had produced in her a hunger for being better—that hungering and thirsting after righteousness. No gems, no gifts with the hand, but a newness of life he had given her.

"These impalpable, ineffable, soul emotions—when men convey these to another soul they have given the best of gifts. Afterwards they may give inferior things —their bread, their rent, or whatever it may be; but these things are not to be counted as being the most charitable, and the most religious, because they are the most tangible.

"That which makes a man a better man is the best gift you can bestow on him. The disciples said, 'Why was this waste of ointment made?' Not one of them had ever had a feeling which hurt him, as yet. Not one of them ever felt as the unlocked stream does when spring melts the ice—that it must overflow its channel and have a freshet. And while they were blaming her for extravagance, if you had said, 'She is expressing one of the deepest sentiments of our nature,' the reply would have been, 'Sentiments! Sentimentality!—what is that good for?' Christ n ver lifted a hand to build a monument but once, and that was when he blessed the sentiment of love in this woman who undertook with speechless love to interpret the heart's deep devotion for him. He said, 'Wherever my Gospel shall be preached, throughout the wide world, in all time, this shall be told a memorial of her.'"

Mr. Beecher reminds those who would anoint Jesus that he has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

"WHY WAS NOT THIS OINTMENT SOLD FOR THREE HUNDRED PENCE AND GIVEN TO THE POOR?"

Illustration and Application

What is it like in Nature? What an outpoured alabaster box of God's love for man, is this opening spring! God provides for us beauty and fragrance, as well as utility. See God's overflowing spikenard in the flowers! Let not the farmer think the singing birds useless because he can not sell their eggs. How they pour out their gifts of song!

"How stupid life is!" said the mole.
"This earth is a dull dirty hole!
I eat, I dig, and I store;
But find it all a bore!"

The lark sang high in the blue:
"How sweet is the morning dew!
How clear the brooks, how fair the flowers,
I rejoice in this world of ours!"

Which would you be of the two?
I side with the lark—don't you? PRISCILLA LEONARD.

There is no narrow utilitarianism in God's world school, no calculating economy in his gifts to man. He gives us butterflies for the eye as well as bees to bring delight to the palate. A thousand things God makes to feed the higher sentiments, while he remembers also our lower needs. In the words of Herbert:

For us the winds do blow,
The earth dost rest, heaven move, and fountains flow;
Nothing we see but means our good,
As our delight or as our treasure:
The whole is either our cupboard of food,
Or cabinet of pleasure.

Humbolt tells of discovering lovely flowers in the ver lips of the crater of Vesuvius. Pulverized lava had set tled in an earthquake-riven crevice, to which wind c bird had borne a seed, on which God had dropped th rain, and so the flowers had grown up as it were, on th very edge of hell. In a coal-mine, some visitors saw snow-white plant. On their expressing astonishmen that a plant could grow in such a place and keep its pur ity, a miner threw coal-dust upon it again and again, bu it would not cling. Thus does God pour out beaut everywhere, as if to remind man that noblest sentiment of gratitude and purity and hope, may be cherished an manifested under most adverse circumstances, eve when we are surrounded by the fires of adversity, or th smart of enforced evil associations. Only the ocean i great enough in all God's world, in its beneficence out poured on every shore, to picture the outpoured love o God.

A fount that never fails, a sea without a shore.
O the ocean of the love of God!

What is it like in the Bible? With Mary should be studied two other Bible women, whose expression of love, and hope, and faith in deed rather than word, Christ similarly appreciated. One day as Jesus sat in the Temple, over against the treasury, he saw rich Jews throw in their gold, and when they had passed on, a wizened woman, poorly clad and manifestly poorly fed as well, reached her thin hand into her almost empty bag and taking out two mites, only half a cent, she threw them, in uncalculating faith and love—all she had —into the treasury of the God she loved. "She hath given more than they all," said Jesus. And let us not forget she hath given as generously as this Mary, whose precious spikenard was worth three hundred pence. No one has a right to say, "I will give my mite," referring to that widow's great gift of love, who is not pouring out his all. That story is too sacred for anything but an hour of full consecration.

The other woman whose soul poured itself into a deed worthy to be named with this, was the paralytic who, in the crowd, touched the blue fringe of Christ's garment, the symbol of his heavenly work, and put into that secret touch much of her heart's noblest sentiment of faith and love. That which makes these three women like each other—alas, also unlike so many of us—was that they poured out their overflowing faith and love in deeds that brought them each the responsive appreciation and love, and blessing of Christ. In the Second Psalm there is a supreme but neglected expression of burning love to Christ as our King: "Kiss the Son." In monarchies the subject kisses the hand of his sovereign, to express loving loyalty, the devotion of his very heart, and his pledge to be led by the King's hand. Sometimes this is but a form, but surely in every Christian, loyalty should be loving loyalty, with the hearts' full tide behind it. Consecration is but another name for this loving loyalty.

What is it like in Common Life? The minister made an appeal to his congregation for money to help a mission church away off in the mountains. He saw sadly that he had failed, and that the people were not going to give what he desired. Away in the back part of the house sat poor little crippled, but Christian Katie. She was touched by the appeal for money to help carry the story of Jesus to the children who had never heard about him. She had nothing she could give but her little crutches. She looked at them a moment and said, "I'll give my crutches." The minister took them forward and laid them on the table. He was deeply stirred with emotion. "Who will help me to buy these little crutches back for little Katie?" Katie, in her earnestness, had forgotten all about how she would get home, or how she would move about without her crutches. One man spoke up and said, "I will give a hundred dollars." And they kept on giving one after another till the little crutches were covered with money and promises, and that night the preacher raised over five hundred dollars for his mission church. To some eyes the alabaster box and these crutches have no resemblance, but to Jesus, no doubt, they look very much alike. In both cases he could say, "She hath done what she could."

Boarding vs. Home Life

THOUSANDS of people must pitch their tents where they can, and must be satisfied with the temporary and transient comforts afforded by a boarding-house or hotel, because for one or another reason they cannot establish themselves in a home of their own. Considerations of economy induce people in city life to board rather than keep house, the single item of rent being formidable enough to frighten men of small incomes from taking its burden upon them. In the tenement districts where the population is crowded, one is aghast at the amount charged the very poor for the merest shelter. In good neighborhoods, adapted to persons of refinement and supposedly able to live in respectability and to exercise some hospitality, rents alone are often prohibitive, and, erroneously, people fly to the suburban villages, expecting relief there. The promise of such relief results in disillusionment, for suburban housekeeping is nothing if not costly, and has about it so many extras that in the end it completely swamps a small salary. Modern home life, except in rural places, distant from commercial centres, is apt to be expensive, and boarding offers itself as an inviting substitute. "At least," says the man of the house, "I shall know exactly how much I shall have to pay per week or month, and I can regulate my expenses accordingly."

Possibly, in some cases, boarding is cheaper. If, for example, a husband and wife resort to the common expedient of taking rooms in an apartment hotel with meals a la carte, in a restaurant attached to the house, they may save money. They may cook their own light breakfast, the wife may cook her luncheon or forage in restaurants as she goes about her little errands, and they may spend most of their daily allowance for food on a good dinner. But in a majority of instances, they discover that with all their careful planning and endeavor, they do spend, and are compelled to spend, a good deal more than they expected, and they give up in despair at last, and go back to housekeeping.

Another reason for choosing to board, is the hope that somebody else may have the worry of the servants, and leave the perplexed and weary house-mistress free. Domestic service with us is not in a condition of ease or pleasure to either party. To carry one's precious goods and chattels, one's dearly-beloved curios, one's cherished silver, one's old mahogany, into a boarding-house or hotel, is not practicable. So, in the first place, the furniture is stored. Books are packed away in boxes; the familiar china goes into retirement. A woman who loves her things—and what true woman does not feel a strong attachment to them—to her beds, bureaus, chairs and tables, to the pictures, the clocks and the vases she has been proud of—undergoes a keen pang when she sees these treasures sent into storage! She becomes a nomad, a tent-dweller: she gives up the blessedness of permanence that inheres in the separate household. A man may care little about this. A woman cannot but care.

To the newly-married woman, a boarding-house life beckons, because as yet she has not accumulated the several furnishings of a home. But on the threshold of her wifely existence, she is met by a subtle temptation that may drift her on its waves into a life of idleness. John is absent all day, and Molly has nothing to do. Her trousseau is ample and she has no sewing. Without any work to fill her hands, she falls easily into a way of spending half hours now and again in the rooms of other boarders, and, unless she be above the average woman in will and intellect, she may degenerate into a fondness for trivial gossip. On the bride, boarding has a distinctly deteriorating effect, and on the young husband, too; for just when privacy is most desirable and solitude a boon, the two are forced to live very much in public.

As for children, the only right environment for them is a home, be it ever so humble. A country home is ideal, as they have room to play, room to expand, room to grow. There are errands and "chores," daily recurrent tasks about a country home that fall to the lot of boys and girls, and these are lacking in the steam-heated city flat, with its score of conveniences, its chutes and speaking-tubes and electric lights and elevators. But a city home, four walls, within which father and mother and children dwell in unity is a home, as two or three rooms in an inn seldom are to children. Retirement, withdrawal from outsiders, quiet, obligation to help one another, and the small self-denials that belong to home-life and make it sweet, are all very desirable factors in the development and right training of children.

SAILING AWAY

Sailing away to fairy land,
The children watch the mimic boat.
Away and away on the sea-green wave,
The tiny vessel will float.

Only a tub, but they make believe,
And grandmother sits and dreams.
So much in life is real, you know,
If you only will take what seems.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—Hope. The surname of the Royal family of England is Guelph.

Mattie. Bread and butter plates stand at the left of the dinner plate, and remain on the table until the dessert.

—Rachel B. Your father's objection to your sweetheart, if correctly stated, is extremely silly. Why should your future husband be objectionable because he is a German? I advise you to wait a while, and as you are of sufficient age, if your father still refuses his consent, decide for yourself.

—Grocer's Boy. It is certainly provoking to be detained on your route so that you cannot get home to meals in time, by the propensity of people to talk instead of giving their orders. I advise you simply to take the orders, and then leave. If people talk of other things, politely remind them that time is precious.

—Annie Laurie. A young girl who is expecting to become a missionary in China or Japan, should aim to obtain the best education possible. A college diploma would not be amiss; indeed, an ill educated or half educated missionary would in these days find herself likely to be rejected by examining boards. She needs, also, perfect physical health, and it goes without saying that she must be consecrated to Christ and his work.

Y. C. No doubt you would get into very good society should you join some prominent church, but the right motive would be lacking, if this were all you thought of when seeking its membership. A Church is not a social club, but a sort of family composed of those who love and serve the Lord. As for literary aspirations, your knowledge of Tennyson and Longfellow will not help you to success, unless you have original ideas of your own.

Mother's Scrap-Books

THERE are two shelves in the family library set aside for mother's scrap-books. You will find there a cyclopedia of universal knowledge: biography, history, poetry, early history of the county, bits of home news or citations of events; information on happenings over the country, at home and abroad; marriage and death notices of near friends; romance, and humor, in fact, most any reader, no matter how varied his taste, can find something to entertain, instruct, admire, comfort, and amuse.

From time to time as the weeks come and go, there come into our home our friends, the weekly periodicals and newspapers. One of these, a magazine for the young, has been of long acquaintance, having entered our home for the first time in our childhood, commencing with the eldest, and coming down to the youngest. It has always found a ready welcome and has never ceased to instruct and interest us. We have almost come to think we could not do without it, and we would not if we could.

The Christian Herald made its appearance as a Christmas present for mother. It has appealed so strongly to our sympathies, that it has made us feel more and more the blessedness of giving.

There are other periodicals, and the family newspapers containing the home news and the politics of our nation. They seem to be a part of ourselves and our homes. If any one fails to come, its absence is soon noticed and felt. They accumulate so fast that the room they occupy becomes a serious inconvenience. Yet there are many we do not like to destroy. We sometimes share with our friends who are not so well provided with good literature. But sometimes want of time prevents some of us from getting them read, and they are laid by for the convenient season. There are many articles so good that we want to preserve them, and mother takes these papers as they come, and marks a reference on the outside of the paper, to the particular article for preservation. After the papers have been read, when she feels so inclined, she clips the article carefully, pastes it neatly in her scrap-book. She exercises excellent taste both in the selection and arrangement of them. How many times do we find them valuable as books of reference. A visitor comes: In course of conversation some topic is introduced bearing upon something which has happened in the past. Memory fails to relate it correctly, or to give the date of its occurrence. Mother's scrap-book is brought out, and we find it all there.

Aside from the intrinsic value of these books, there is another which transcends it. It is a work of love.

Having passed her eighty-fifth milestone, the arduous labor is set aside, and mother finds entertainment in culling these facts of information, and storing them away in this manner for the benefit of her children and grandchildren.

*The example of this dear lady might be profitably imitated by other readers.—Editor Home Page.

The Child's Calendar Beautiful

The constant desire of mothers and teachers to find appropriate selections for children to memorize and recite, has been met by Miss R. Katharine Beeson, of Lafayette, Ind., in an exquisite volume bearing the above title. Miss Beeson is an enthusiastic teacher, and in selecting and arranging these poems, she has had in view actual children in actual school work. A child's school year extends from September to September, and the poetry here grouped has been used in the study of English, and in ethical study in Indiana schools. I hope a great many mothers and teachers will send to Lafayette, Ind., and procure this book.

An Industrial Gospel Farm

NINETEEN miles from the city of New York is the historic old town of Tappan. In a commodious house, on one of the most fertile farms of this beautiful section, Rev. I. E. Kimball and Mrs. Kimball have opened a Bible Study and Industrial School. Their work was originally begun in 1903 at West Charleston, Vt., but in order that it might be more accessible to students and others, the school was removed to Tappan.

"Anyone desirous of knowing more about the Bible and willing to work, will be accepted. The Bible will be taught as the basis, and science, language, physiology and hygiene as complements of a full course. There are no tuition charges to those who take up the full routine of work."

MRS KIMBALL REV. I. E. KIMBALL

THE KIMBALL INDUSTRIAL TRAINING HOME

An attractive feature of the work is the chance it gives to men who are striving to regain a foothold, after having been "down and out"; men who have seen the error of their ways and are eager to live Christian lives. Striving to commence life anew, these men find it a trying experience to go back to the old environment, full of temptation.

Rev. Mr. Kimball says: "We are preparing to do something for these mission converts, in a simple, inexpensive way. Our Tappan farm and home is incorporated as the New York Home and Bible School. We intend taking these men from the streets, until such time as we can find work and homes for them. Meantime, we will try to establish them in Christian ways. We do not intend to take everyone as a charitable charge, but only those who can work and make themselves useful, and self-supporting. Some of the young and strong will remain to study. Many will make good farm-helpers. Our Home is ultimately to be conducted on a self-supporting basis. Five hours daily will be given to school work, and the remaining five to manual labor, agriculture being the principal means of support.

The board of directors consists of Rev. and Mrs. I. E. Kimball, and A. O. Lund. Rev. C. H. Edwards, Rev. C. S. Morris and D. E. H. M. Sell, 137 West Ninety-fourth Street, New York City, Treasurer.

Welcomed in the Home

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is welcomed every week and read by all the family with great interest. The typographical execution is superb, and the contents, reading matter and illustrations, cannot be excelled. I am recommending the paper whenever I can. The advertisements give a great deal of informntion to most readers.

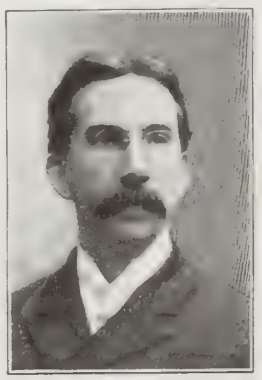
A BROTHERHOOD OFFICER

THE Rev. Wm. H. Pheley, Ph.D., has recently been chosen General Secretary of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip. The work of this Brotherhood has been going along quietly and unostentatiously since 1888, when it was started by the Rev. Rufus W. Miller, in Reading, Pa. For a number of years the Rev. J. Garland Hamner, Jr., has been the genial and efficient secretary. Owing to his illness he was compelled to relinquish the work, and the Rev. Dr. Pheley has been chosen as his successor. For the past few years he has been Superintendent of the Home Department of the Sunday School of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City. He has also issued in large quantities Bible Seed, a neat card for gratuitous distribution. Last year 40,000 of these cards were put out, and much good has resulted from this quiet work.



REV. WM. H. PHELEY, PH. D.

Under the editorship and management of Dr. Pheley, the Brotherhood Star will once more make its appearance, in which he will have the assistance of the Rev. George Edwin Talmage, of Schenectady, an enthusiastic member of the Brotherhood.

Mr. Pheley was born in New York City thirty-six years ago, but soon moved with his parents to Ohio, which was for many years his home and the scene of his studies and early labors. He prepared himself to be a minister and a foreign missionary, but was providentially prevented from going to India, the choice of his heart and his dreams. Not being able to go abroad he has taken up missionary labors in this country, and in his new office, upon which he has so heartily entered, he will have the chance to stimulate and direct the efforts of 20,000 men who wear the Brotherhood button, and are willing, like Andrew and Philip of old, to seek out their fellow-men and win them to Christ.

Where Men of Many Nations Meet

THE impression of a story on a boy's life found its expression on March 22, when the opening of the splendid building of the French Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association took place in New York. Years ago, the father of James Stokes told him of a meeting with Lafayette, and of his efforts for the freedom of America. He learned to love France, as he admired the great General, and he determined to do something for its people. When a young man in his teens, Mr. Stokes joined the New York City Y. M. C. A., and when Mr. Moody held his great meetings in that city, he played the organ for him. His interest in young men grew, and his thoughts turned constantly to France and her young men.

He found that the Young Men's Christian Association in Paris was a feeble, struggling thing, and with one of the leading secretaries of the International Committee, he went over to reorganize it. Then he gave a large sum for a building there. In this enterprise he was joined by M. Andre, the great Parisian banker. Now, that Association has over a thousand members and from it radiate influences which extend over the nation. What he did for France he has begun to do for Italy, by establishing a building at Rome, and for Russia by fostering an Association there, which now has over one thousand members—the greatest thing of the kind in Europe.

MR. JAMES STOKES

Seventeen years ago, a French branch of the Y. M. C. A. was formed in the basement of the French church in New York City. Mr. Stokes has constantly given to it time and money, until the completion of the building has been made possible by his enterprise and gifts. It is a splendid home for the Association, which is to stand as a place of welcome and encouragement for young men of foreign tongues coming to our shores.

"This is much the most interesting historical occasion that has occurred in my lifetime in New York," remarked Bishop Potter at the opening. "A rabbi, a Greek priest, Protestant clergymen, representatives of many nation, stand together on this platform. This building stands for the decay of animosity, for the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God."

Short addresses were made by Rabbi Seligman, Mr. John R. Mott, and others. The Minister from Peru cordially invited Mr. Stokes to do for the young men of his nation what he had done for Russia, France, Italy, and for young Frenchmen in New York, and the Cuban Minister heartily filed a similar request for his country and Havana.

The Ambassadors of France, Russia, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Brazil, Argentine Republic, Peru, Chili, Mexico and Cuba, were represented in person or by their delegates. The Department of State was represented in the person of Secretary Pierce, late diplomat at St. Petersburg; the navy, by Rear-Admiral Coughlan. Bishop Potter, Baron von Pletenberg, Wm. Fellowes Morgan, President of the New York City Associations, and prominent representatives of the international, State and city Associations, were also present. Sir Henry Mortimer Durand, British Ambassador, was detained, but sent a message of good-will for Great Britain, and Sir George Williams, founder of the Association, and Association leaders in France, Russia and Italy, cabled their hearty congratulations.

The guests were entertained by Mr. James Stokes, who has been the leader in this movement, and whose gifts, with others, have made the building possible. In his address, he hoped the building would express the interest of American Christianity in the young men coming to its shores from many lands, and that then the Association members would be the first to extend the hand of welcome and helpfulness to them.

In the evening, the members of the French Chamber of Commerce and the foreign residents of the city were present. Already five nationalities are represented in the membership of this Association—French, Russian, Belgian, Swiss and Italian. It will be a popular meeting place for young men who have not acquired the American language and customs, and are not ready to enter other branches in the city. Dormitories, gymnasium, restaurant, social rooms and auditorium are splendidly equipped. Educational classes in English and practical branches will be conducted. The value of the plant exceeds $100,000. This Association is one of thirty-three in New York City.

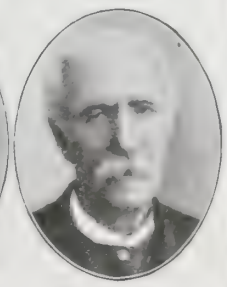
Men of the Hour

PRESIDENT CASTRO

GIFFORD PINCHOT

FRIDTJOF NANSEN



MANUEL GARCIA

GIFFORD PINCHOT, head of the Bureau of Forestry, at Washington, is doing much to stop the destruction of American woods. He has written several books dealing with the subject of arboriculture. Indiscriminate burning and cutting have already resulted in diminished water supply in many places, and several States have created special boards that will act under instructions sent out by Mr. Pinchot.

PRESIDENT CASTRO of Venezuela, has the unpleasant faculty of getting himself and his country into awkward predicaments. He recently confiscated the property of a French company, which brought a most vigorous protest from France. At present he also has trouble with England, Germany, Holland, and the cable company. As a result, all commercial enterprises in Venezuela are on the decline.

FRIDTJOF NANSEN, who made himself famous as a daring Arctic explorer, has been taking an active part in Norwegian politics recently. The dispute with Sweden over the consular question has reached an acute stage, the Norwegians demanding separate representation abroad. Sweden naturally objects to this proposal. It is said that Nansen, in the near future may be Prime Minister for Norway.

MANUEL GARCIA, the inventor of the laryngoscope, has just celebrated his one hundredth birthday. He received the congratulations of musicians the world over, as well as gifts and greetings from several sovereigns. He was born in Madrid, Spain, but has spent a great part of his life in England, and all of his writings on singing and the physiology of the voice, have been published in English.

True heating economy.

The home builder discredits the best value of his property at the very start unless he puts in steam or hot water heating.

AMERICAN & IDEAL RADIATORS & BOILERS

bring a quicker transaction at a higher price in the event of sale or lease of the property.

Meanwhile they produce true heating comfort for the owner, protect the family health, reduce his fuel bills, require no repairs, are dustless, simpler to run than a parlor stove, and they outlast the building.

Unlike stoves or hot-air furnaces, our Boilers and Radiators are made upon the unit or sectional plan, so that if the building is made larger, or the rooms altered (65% of all buildings are rebuilt) extra sections or parts may be readily added or removed. Hence, to buy IDEAL Boilers and AMERICAN Radiators is an investment—not an expense.

Whether your building is OLD or new, SMALL or large, farm or city, send for our booklet (free) "Heating Investments Successful."

CHILDREN AFFECTED

By Mother's Food and Drink

Many babies have been launched into life with constitutions weakened by disease taken in with their mother's milk. Mothers cannot be too careful as to the food they use while nursing their babes. The experience of a Kansas City mother is a case in point:

"I was a great coffee drinker from a child, and thought I could not eat a meal without it. But I found at last it was doing me harm. For years I had been troubled with dizziness, spots before my eyes and pain in my heart, to which was added two years ago, a chronic sour stomach. The baby was born 7 months ago, and almost from the beginning, it, too, suffered from sour stomach. She was taking it from me!

"In my distress I consulted a friend of more experience than mine, and she told me to quit coffee, that coffee did not make good milk. I have since ascertained that it really dries up the milk.

"So, I quit coffee, and tried tea and at last cocoa. But they did not agree with me. Then I turned to Postum Coffee with the happiest results. It proved to be the very thing I needed. It not only agreed perfectly with baby and myself, but it increased the flow of my milk. My husband then quit coffee and used Postum, quickly got well of the dypepsia with which he had been troubled. I no longer suffer from the dizziness, blind spells, pain in my heart or sour stomach.

"Now we all drink Postum, from my husband to my seven months' old baby. It has proved to be the best hot drink we have ever used. We would not give up Postum for the best coffee we ever drank." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

CURRENT ANECDOTES

A Sermon in a Saloon

A CLERGYMAN out in New Mexico was in the habit of going to Los Cerillos occasionally to conduct services. One winter's day, when snow was falling heavily, he was there waiting for a train that showed no sign of coming. There was no fire at the station, and the minister was almost frozen. The saloon-keeper saw him, and hospitably urged him to come in and wait in the warm. The clergyman said "I can't, Bill; you know why." "Yes, I know," said the saloon-keeper, "but you come right in. They shan't bother you." The Youth's Companion gives the following account of the result:

He led the minister into a big room, where thirty or forty cowboys and miners were drinking. Bill rapped loudly on the bar.

"Fellers," he said, "the parson's laid out by his train what ain't came, an' he's no place to go but this here gin palace an' poker parlor. He'll sit with us and swap yarns—the right sort, you understand—but thar'll be no drink sold over this bar and no cards played till his train comes along. He's our guest. The parson, gentlemen!"

There was not a protest from a man. The young minister was acquainted with most of them, and soon made friends with the others. They talked of lodes, pay-dirt, methods of drilling, best ways to break broncos, liniments for healing gunshot wounds, the qualities of various makes of firearms. Finally one of the "cow-punchers" asked the guest "to make a little talk on the subject of his profession." Gladly he mounted one of the card-tables, and in their own picturesque language, as he had learned it from them, told them of the Martyr of Calvary and the compassionate Father. As he spoke, they threw away their cigars and removed their hats. Not a sound escaped them. They were on their honor, and would have handled roughly any man who showed the parson a discourtesy.

The minister afterward confessed that he never spent a more profitable hour himself, or a more enjoyable one, or one in which profit and enjoyment seemed to be more completely mutual. When the whistle of his train was heard, the congregation was lustily singing a hymn.

Won by a Kiss

AT a Salvation Army meeting in Paris recently, one of the speakers, a woman of sweet, loving disposition, stepped down from the platform and passed down the aisle on her way to the door. As she went, she was particularly attracted by the face of a girl who sat on one of the benches. It was singularly beautiful, but bore the traces of dissipation. Her dress and bearing told her story only too plainly, and marked her as belonging to the most depraved class of the French capital. The Christian lady paused for a moment, and taking the girl's face between her hands, gave her a loving kiss. "You dear girl," she said, "I wish you knew my Saviour." She said no more, but passed out. The girl sat as if stunned for a moment and then put her face in her hands and wept like a child. It was many a year since a pure kiss had been printed on her cheek and it broke her down. The next night she was there again, and eagerly sought the lady who had kissed her. "Why did you kiss me?" she asked; "you do not know what I am." The lady took her hand and said, "I guess, you poor child!" And she told her of Christ's compassion and his promise of salvation to the worst of sinners. The girl has now given up her dissolute associates, abandoned her evil life, and is bringing her sisters in vice to the Saviour.

A Rescued Prince

A STRANGE story of salvation from massacre comes from Central Africa. It is so like the story told in II. Kings 11, of the murder of the royal family by Queen Athaliah, that history seems to be repeating itself. Rev. Adolphe Jalla, writing from Lealuyi, in Barotsiland, says: "We are just back from the capital, where there is a great feast to-day. The people have been flowing in all the morning from all parts of the plain, as they have been called by the big war-drums. They came with their spears and guns, for they had not been told the reason of the call. A son of the king, about twenty-five years old, is the hero of the day. Ever since 1885 they had believed he had been murdered during the revolution. In that year, the king and queen escaped from the insurgents, taking with them only one child. They heard afterwards that all the others were massacred. Instead of that, this son, whose name is Nguana, was sold as a slave and taken to the Bihe, far away to the west, in Portuguese territory. There, after long years, he was taken care of by American missionaries. He was soon among the inquirers. He arrived here nearly three months ago, but his tale was too marvellous to be believed. However, little by little the proof came in. He at last was allowed to see his mother in the presence of the king's sister. They knew each other at once, and cried with emotion. To-day all the capital is stirred up. Rejoicings, salutations, dances, distributions of food are going on. We went also, and showed our joy by singing hymns with all the Christians, and many others joined us." The missionaries anticipate great good from the young man's influence.

Controlling the Horses

DURING one of Professor Henry Drummond's tours, he stayed with a lady whose coachman had given her a great deal of trouble. He had periodical fits of drunkenness, and though he had signed the pledge several times, he always broke it. When Drummond was leaving the house, the lady said to him: "This man will drive you to the station; say a word to him if you can. He wants to reform, but he is weak." While they were driving down, the horses bolted. The driver held on to the reins, and manipulated them well. The professor expected every moment to be upset; but presently the man drew the horses up, steaming with perspiration, and said: "I say, that was a close shave. Our carriage might have been smashed into matchwood, and we might both have been killed." "Well," said Professor Drummond, "how was it that it did not happen?" "Why," was the reply, "because I knew how to manage the horses." "Now," said the professor, "look here, my friend, I will give you a bit of advice. Here's my train coming. I hear you have been signing the pledge and breaking out again. I sat still, and trusted you to control the horses, because it is your business and you could do it better than I. Now you let Jesus Christ hold the reins of your life. He can do it; it is his business." Drummond sprang out of the carriage and took the train, but the coachman went home thoughtfully. He took the advice and was kept from falling.

A Blind Address

AMONG the curious foreign letters received at the New York Post Office recently, was one with no other address than "My Mother, New York, America." The letter came from Ireland, but there was no other clue. It would have been more labor than even letter-carriers would be willing to undertake, to show the letter to every Irish mother who had a son in the old country. The letter therefore was laid aside to await developments.

A day or two after the receipt of this mysterious missive, a cheery-looking Irishwoman elbowed her way to the general inquiry window. "Ye haven't a letter from me b'y, have ye?" she queried, eagerly.

As most of the employees on that floor had had a laugh over the address of the letter to "my mother," the thought of it returned to the mind of the inquiry clerk at mention of "me b'y." It was quite possible that such a questioner might be the mother of such a writer.

The home of the "b'y" was found to be the same as the postmark on the letter, and after a few more precautionary inquiries, the missive was handed over to "my mother," on condition that she open it on the spot and verify her claim. This was done, and "my mother" was actually identified among the three million and a half recipients of mail-matter in the great city. Mother and son found one another.

PROPHETIC PERIODS

By REV. M. BAXTER, Author of "Forty Future Wonders"*

THE end of this age is stated in Daniel's twelfth chapter to be at the end of 1,335 lunar years (equal to 1,295 ordinary solar years) of the Mohammedan Persecuting Power from its establishment as an abomination of desolation in Syria and the Holy Land. This period began with the Mohammedans marching from Mecca in Arabia into Syria, and capturing Damascus, the capital of Syria, in the year 634 A.D.; and capturing Jerusalem in 636. Thence 1,335 Mohammedan lunar years reach from 634 to 1929, or from 636 to 1931. John Aq. Brown, in his two volumed exposition Eventide, published in London in 1823, and also Dr. Grattan Guinness, in 1885, showed that the 1,335 years were the predicted period of the Mohammedan Antichrist existing as an abomination of desolation, and must be counted as Mohammedan lunar years, by which their calendar is reckoned. J. A. Brown predicted that the 1,260 lunar years of the Mohammedan calendar, which commenced at the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina, on July 16, 622, would terminate about the end of March, 1844, with a marked decline of Turco-Mohammedan persecuting power. This came to pass on March 21, 1844, when Turkey was forced by other nations to abandon the beheading of Mohammedans who became Christians. He predicted another decline of Turkish Power to occur in 1917.

The 2,520 solar years, or "seven times" (seven periods of 360 years), in Daniel 4:16, of the downtreading of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the four successive Gentile empires of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece and Rome, prefigured by the metallic human image and four wild beasts in Daniel 2 and 7, terminate in A.D. 1931, because they began in B.C. 590, when Nebuchadnezzar commenced his final siege of Jerusalem, which resulted (B.C. 588) in its destruction of the temple and palaces of Jerusalem and carrying captive all the Jews to Babylon and the slaying of Zedekiah their last king, as stated in the last chapters of II. Kings and II. Chronicles. These "Seven Times" were spoken of by Christ in Luke 21:24: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."

It is now generally held by leading expositors that the prophetic periods of 2,300, 1,335, 1,290, and 1,260 days, or three and one-half times, or forty-two months, mentioned in Daniel 8:14; 7:25; 7:7-12; and Revelation 11:2, 3; 12:6, 14; 13:5, have a year-day fulfilment, after the example of Numbers 14:34 and Ezekiel 4:5, 6, as so many years in connection with the Papal despotic power in Western Europe and the simultaneous Mohammedan despotic power in Eastern Europe; but will have also their main literal day fulfilment as the same number of days in connection with a future personal despot who has been typified and foreshadowed by Nebuchadnezzar, Alexander the Great, the Cæsars, the Popes, Mohammed and the Turkish Sultans, and Napoleon the Great, and he will, to a certain extent, re-enact their career within the final ten or twelve years of this age.

The 2,300 years in Dan. 8:14 began in the month of Nisan, B.C. 445, the twentieth year of Artaxerxes' reign, with his command to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, as stated in Nehemiah's second chapter, and predicted in Daniel 9:25, and ended on the 22d day of Nisan (April 27) in 1856, on which day the Crimean War Treaty of Peace was signed, which granted religious toleration to Turkey and Syria, and thus the cleansing of the Jewish sanctuary began. There are also 1,260 lunar years (=1,222 years) of Mohammedan desolation of Judea, from 634 to 1856; then from 1856 there remain either 75 lunar years to Nisan 22, 1929, or 75 solar years to Nisan 22, 1931 (the 75 years being the overplus of the 1,335 above and beyond the 1,260 in Daniel 12:7, 12). There is also a period of 1,260 solar years of Papal despotism, from 596, when Pope Gregory the Great assumed temporal power, to 1856, and thence 75 solar years would end in 1931.

The angel's oath in Revelation 10:6, prefiguring the reformation epoch, which culminated in the massacre of 60,000 Protestant Huguenots in France on St. Bartholomew's Eve in 1572, is understood to signify that from that massacre "there shall be a time [or chronos of 360 years] no longer" before the end of this age—i.e., that this age shall end before 1932. The Rev. Dr. Grattan Guinness, in his prophetic writings in 1885, said: "Historical interpreters agree that the tenth chapter of Revelation symbolizes the great Protestant reformation of 1517 to 1572. The angel, who is Christ himself, swears that 'there shall not be yet "a time" (in Greek, a "chronos," of 360 years) before the mystery of God should be finished.' This 'time,' measured from the massacre on St. Bartholomew's Eve in 1572, extends to 1932, which is also the end of the 'seven times,' or 2,520 years, measured from the Jewish King Zedekiah's overthrow in 588–9 B. C."

The statement, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels, neither the Son," was spoken in the present tense by Christ eighteen centuries ago, with regard to that time only, and, of course, cannot apply to these latter days, for, if so, it states that even now Christ does not know the day and the hour of his own second advent, which is incredible. Moreover, Daniel's dates were not then fulfilled; nor was the Book of Revelation yet then written, "which God gave to show unto his servants things which must come to pass." The prophecies were stated in Daniel 12 to be "sealed up until the present time of the end," when "many shall search into them, and knowledge of them shall be increased, and the wise shall understand them."

It is only reasonable to conclude that, as there was a precise termination, even to the very day of the predicted period of 120 years which ended the antediluvian dispensation (Genesis 6:3; 7:4-10)—and of the predicted period of 430 years which ended the patriarchal dispensation on Passover Day (Genesis 15:13, 14; Exodus 12:41)—and of the predicted period of 40 years which ended the wilderness dispensation on Passover Day (Numbers 14:33; Joshua 5:6, 10)—and of the predicted period of 483 years (69 weeks of years) which ended the Jewish dispensation at the crucifixion on Passover Day (Daniel 9:25, 26; Mark 15)—so there will be a precise termination of our Christian age or dispensation at the end of Daniel's great prophetic periods of 2,520 years, or "seven times," of the downtreading of the Jewish nation and Judea since 590 B. C. by the four consecutive Gentile empires, and of the 1,335 lunar years of Mohammedanism since 634 or 636 A. D. Both these periods will end about 1929 or 1931, at the same time as the seven years of the Jewish covenant end with a Passover Week.

Values it Next to the Bible

Permit me to acknowledge the receipt of The Great Hereafter, and to express my very great delight at receiving such a book. With the exception of the Bible, there are, indeed, very few books that could equal it in its richness of thought and spiritual solidity. I would not part with it for anything, and am glad to thus be given an opportunity to express my gratitude for it.

New Haven, Conn. MRS. MARY STAEF.

A Voice from Far Alaska

I am in receipt of your check for $18.50 for the advancement of our work among the Eskimo. It gives me pleasure to acknowledge this favor. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has given me much encouragement. There seems no part of the world too small or insignificant for its attention, and the more the misery and destitution, the more it considers the place or people. Through the beneficence of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the paper and its readers have made it a Christian charity in deed, if not in name.

It is pleasing that the short and simple annals of the benighted Eskimo have reached the hearts of your kind readers. Now, at this season of the year, there is little sun and light in this Northern land. There are benighted souls here in whose hearts the Sun of Righteousness has never risen, and a double darkness shadows their lives and souls. It is our desire that some homely and fur-clad Eskimo may sing praises to God, when the donors of this gift, and of other gifts of your readers, wherever the gifts may be sent, join the multitude of the redeemed in God's eternal city. May the work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers continue until Christ himself returns to his own. J. H. ROMIG, M.D.

House and Home

The Transformed Parlor

THE old-time parlor, which must be opened only upon state and formal occasions, is now giving way to the "living room." Instead of the formal, shut-up room, the scene of occasional weddings and funerals, we have the "parlor transformed," in other words, the forbidding features have been eliminated, and a cheerful substitution made.

We all remember that old-fashioned parlor, opened for airing, sweeping and dusting; then carefully closed, lest a ray of light or sunshine should steal in and fade the carpet. The hair-cloth furniture never had a very inviting "stay-as-long-as-you-can" air, and while the hostess may have been most cordial in her invitation to the visitor to call again, the kindly words were not echoed by the prim walls.

The walls occupy our attention first. If one still adheres to the notion of wall-paper being the most desirable covering, a small pattern on a red ground makes a cheerful combination. The watchwords for this room from the beginning, should be cheerfulness and comfort. There are various substitutes for wall-paper now on the market, which are both hygienic and attractive. Denim and burlaps come in attractive tints, and are easily applied; there are also various liquid finishes of appropriate tints, which can be applied with a brush, and make a durable and sanitary wall. A dado or frieze can also be applied with a stencil pattern on a contrasting shade or color. If hardwood is out of the question, denim makes an excellent floor covering, over which can be thrown rugs of various sizes, a large one for the centre of the room. In this room should stand a big table for books, magazines and papers. Over this may be hung a good light, tempered, but not obscured, by a red shade. Do not forget the Morris chair, with its comfortable cushions, for father; or the dainty rocker for mother, with her mending or bit of fancy work. Now we see why we have not utilized the dining-room, instead of the parlor, for our every-day living room. There would have been no room in the former for two very important features—book-cases, and piano or organ. Tom would often spend an evening reading books were they at hand, and one would often play on hour or two if it were not cold and lonely in the old-time front room. So we put in some of those sectional book-cases (and it is wonderful how soon we need additions). Next, turn the piano, so that the player may partly face the other occupants of the room; while not neglecting the up-to-date musical compositions, there is a mellowing influence in the strains of the old songs that father and mother used to sing. How cozy and pleasant it all seems:

When the lights are low,
And the flickering shadows softly come and go.

There is not a thing left to remind one of the old parlor. The haircloth sofa has given place to a wide couch with a woven-wire and hair-mattress foundation, covered with bagdad or cretonne. It has big, soft, inviting pillows, piled high at the back and ends. Every chair is an easy one, and there are plenty of them. There are pretty draperies at the windows. A Franklin open-grate stove lends its quota of coziness and comfort. The very pictures on the walls send out a cheery welcome, for there is not a gloomy suggestion in one of them. The children have their own corner, where they sit about a low table, to study or play games. No lamp is upon this table, however. It hangs from a bracket on the wall, bright, but shaded like that over the centre table. The musical instrument has its own special illuminant, and the whole atmosphere seems redolent of rest and happy contentment.

A Birthday Greeting, 1905

THERE is an old-time story—
Too strange almost for words—
By which has come the naming
Of earth's most radiant birds.
Those wondrous living jewels,
The Birds of Paradise,
'Twas thought had ne'er alighted,
Nor would, beneath the skies.
They showed such wondrous colors,
They seemed too pure and bright
For earth to claim their presence,
Except in upward flight.

O, singer of the Gospel!
Of home beyond the skies;
Of peace and rest in Jesus;
Our thought to thee-ward flies.
Thy hand hath pointed upward,
To yonder land of day;
And thousands, through thy singing,
Have found the Heav'nly Way.
Thy voice, thy life, thy music,
Tell ever of the skies,
We greet thee, on thy birthday,
Our "Bird of Paradise!"

Brooklyn, N. Y. FLORA KIRKLAND.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

M. U. M., Ont. "I read with interest the 'Answered Prayers.' I was in deep mental distress, from which my God delivered me and strengthened me. I wish to add my testimony to his goodness and mercy."

Mrs. Rhoda M., Wahpeton, N. Dakota. "I wish to express my gratitude to God for a wonderful answer to prayer in saving my life. May the good Lord sustain us all and keep us under the shadow of his protecting wing."

Mrs. A. D. B., Clinton, Ia. "When in great trouble I prayed for the recovery of a loved one and for comfort and strength for myself. God graciously answered my prayer, for which I wish to make public acknowledgment."

Anxious Mother, Parksville, Ky. "I want to add my testimony to those who believe in a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. I have had so many prayers answered, that I could not fail to believe. I am praying now that a great trouble may be removed, and ask others to pray for me."

E. E. R., Kansas. "I read with great satisfaction the column headed, 'Answered Prayers.' I feel it a pleasure to acknowledge in a public way, answered prayers for both spiritual and temporal blessings. I am sure that if we ask aright, God always hears and answers prayer, according to his will."

Mrs. S. S., Wisconsin. "So many times in hours of trouble I called to our dear Father for help and he always heard me. I have derived much benefit from the 'Answered Prayer' column, and through it I wish to acknowledge God's loving kindness for all who place their confidence in him."

Anxious Mother, Pennsylvania. "I am so grateful for the 'Answered Prayer' column. It gives me new hope and courage. I most thankfully acknowledge many prayers answered. I have been pleading a long time for the conversion of a dear son. Will the CHRISTIAN HERALD readers please help me pray for him."

B. E. A. "I want the whole world to know that my life was saved through prayer. I rejoice today in the knowledge of a personal Saviour, and those who feel they have prayed in vain, buckle on your armor and pray again, remembering, 'He is abundantly able to give us more than we can even ask or think.'"

S. F., Ventura, Calif. "I desire to acknowledge God's faithfulness. I was in trouble and my way was dark. 'It is not in man to direct his steps.' I took all to Jesus and asked him to undertake for me. I waited patiently on him and he answered in his own way. We may trust him with our temporal affairs, for 'he faileth not.' And the spiritual longings of our souls he delights to satisfy."

Acknowledgments of answered prayers have been received from Susan C. C., Oneida, N. Y.; Mrs. Adaline W., Ronney, Va.; Mrs. J. S., Jefferson City, Wis.; Mrs. J. Uplifting Fallen Humanity

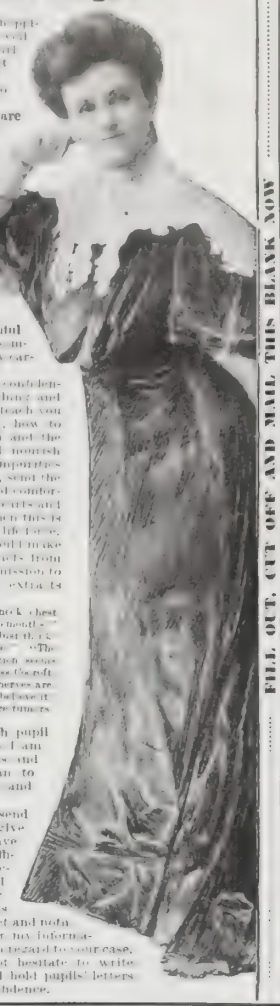
In my humble opinion, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing more for the uplifting of fallen humanity than any other agency in our land. Wishing it a long, prosperous and continued useful life, I am,

Wichita, Kan. J. W. SNYDER.

What Will You Give For

HEALTH AND A GOOD FIGURE?

Will you give me 15 minutes in your own home and get well without drugs?



—perfectly, completely well, with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which healthful and well developed, graceful body alone can give? There is nothing in girlhood or womanhood as lovely as a healthy, vivacious, well-kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and wield influence.

If the lungs, heart, nerves and every vital organ of the body are strong, there is no need of drugs or medicine. The permanent relief from weakness can only be in regaining the strength of weakened organs. It has been shown that about 8,000 out of the 40,000 druggists are handling adulterated drugs and probably fifty per cent. of the drugs contain morphine.

DRUGS ARE DANGEROUS

Any woman by practicing fifteen minutes each day in her own room can have a good figure, clear skin, strong brain and the perfect bodily poise which results from a sound condition of all the vital functions. We women do not want large muscles, but we want that vibrant life force, that healthful spirit which makes life worth living. We also want flexible, symmetrical, well-rounded figures with that graceful, dignified, easy carriage which denotes character, culture and refinement.

EVERY WOMAN CAN HAVE A CLEAR SKIN AND A GOOD FIGURE

My instructions by mail are strictly individual and strictly confidential. I direct the exercise, bathing and diet adapted to your condition, teach you how to breathe, how to stand, how to walk. I strengthen the stomach and the nerves so that your food will nourish you; strengthen the liver, kidneys and intestines so that all impurities are thrown from your system; stimulate a sluggish circulation, send the blood bounding through your veins, so that you feel warm and comfortable, put you in a condition to resist colds, strengthen weak hearts and lungs, relieve you of weaknesses, bane backs and headaches. When this is done, you will have a clear brain, a quick perception and a vibrant life force.

I HAVE HELPED 15,000 WOMEN TO HELP THEMSELVES

I wish you could read the mail on my desk for one day.—It would make you happy as it does me. I am quoting to you below extracts from some letters from my pupils. Some of these names I have permission to give—others I have not—but I can duplicate any one of these extracts many times a day.

"I have a better color in my face than I have had for sixteen years." "My neck, chest and bust are filling out beautifully, and I have gained 14 pounds in the last two months." "I have left off my glasses. Miss Cocroft, and my eyes are much stronger." "Best of all, I can eat anything, my indigestion is all gone." "My catarrh is entirely gone." "The kidneys and liver are working splendidly, and after twenty years my constipation seems to be entirely relieved." "I have not had a headache since my first lesson, Miss Cocroft and the doctor says my heart and lungs are much stronger, and I am sure my nerves are. Those neuralgic pains have entirely gone." "I have lost 16 pounds. Can you believe it? My husband says I look 20 years younger." "Those lumps which I feared were tumors have all gone, and I have no more rheumatism. I'm so happy."

I take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomens and Hips, build up Thin Necks and Chests and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds and hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you the names of women who have been relieved of above and other difficulties. I will send you an illustrated booklet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this booklet and nothing for my information in regard to your case. Do not hesitate to write me. I hold pupils' letters in confidence.

Model Buggies—Money Savers

Try One a Month Free and See

You don't have to empty your pocketbook when you buy a Model Buggy. The reasonableness of Model prices is a mighty strong point, but we do our talking on quality. The Model is in a class all by itself. It is the only One Quality buggy on the market. It is the product of a one Quality factory, using the best of everything. We carry but one quality of stock. We have but one quality of workmanship. Nothing cheap or shoddy can by any possibility get into a Model buggy. Other factories turn out vehicles of various grades—a cheap buggy is made on a finished style the same workmen who make what they call their good buggy—result is the workmanship is practically the same. We use nothing but one grade of material and have only one class of workmen, and producing but one quality of goods there is no chance for mixing the material and making mistakes. Our New MODEL TOP BUGGY for 1905 has all of the style comfort and wearing qualities of any buggy on the market regardless of price. One feature alone that is worth your consideration is genuine French Coach Head Springs, which are furnished on every Model Buggy made by us. This means easy riding comfort and durability, and is a thoroughly desirable feature.

The painting is one of the points that we can talk about very strongly. On cheap buggies the less said about the paint the better. The upholstering in the cushion and back is equal in style, quality and durability to that of any buggy produced and sold for even $25 more money than we ask for our MODEL.

The top has genuine leather quarters and back stays, with a heavy, all-wool headlining—every thread of it is wool and guaranteed fast colors. The general proportion, style and beauty of this job will appeal to you strongly.

You can make no mistake in writing for our catalogue and getting a full description of this buggy, together with regular rock-bottom prices on all styles of vehicles and harness.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved By Absorption

The Foot Pores Now Made to Yield Up Acid Poisons From the Blood by Remarkable Discovery Which All Can

TRY FREE—PAY WHEN SATISFIED.

Send your name to-day; you will get by return mail, postpaid—FREE to Try—a pair of Magic Foot Drafts, the great Michigan Discovery, which has proven such a remarkably safe and sure remedy for rheumatism of all kinds that they are now being extensively imitated abroad as well as in this country. In England infringement against Magic Foot Drafts has recently been enjoined by the courts, thus protecting rheumatic sufferers against imitations liable to be injurious.

Magic Foot Drafts are worn inside the stocking (without the least inconvenience), and they relieve rheumatism, chronic or acute, in every part of the body, by absorbing uric acid and other impurities from the blood through the large foot pores. Thousands of letters from relieved rheumatics—some of them the toughest old chronics in the country, can be seen by anyone calling at our offices. If the Drafts relieved all these people, why shouldn't they relieve you? Write to-day to Magic Foot Draft Co., R A 8 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich. You will get the Drafts by return mail. If you are satisfied with the relief they give, send us one dollar. If not, send nothing. You decide. A valuable new book (in colors) on rheumatism comes free with the Drafts. Send no money, only your name.

of the teeth Stop Instantly on application of Dent's Toothache Gum—a remedy that goes to the bottom of the trouble by cleansing the cavity and arresting decay. It removes the offensive odors of decay, and prevents future aches. Quickly applied, and will not fall out, or melt in the mouth. Will keep for years—no waste by spilling or drying up.

DENT'S Toothache Gum

will stop the ache whether there's a cavity or not. Get a bottle at once and keep it for emergencies. Used by leading dentists. Sold by responsible druggists, 15c; or by mail on receipt of price. When you buy, be sure it is DENT'S. Dent's Corn Gum removes corns, bunions and warts, 15c at druggists, or we mail it. HOUSEHOLD NOVELTY WORKS, Chicago, Ill., or Buffalo, N.Y

Christian Recreation*

ONE of the best tests of moral character is, how a man having an evening free of engagements, in a strange city, in which he does not know a single person, will spend his time. What he decides to do, will show his idea of pleasure. He is beckoned by the saloon, the billiard-parlor, the theatre, the lecture-platform, the library and the Church. He is free to choose. What will he do? At home he may be restrained by thoughts of what others who know him will think of him, but in such circumstances, the man as he really is will be disclosed.

Every one has read Emerson's essay on Compensation, in which he represents the good man as denying himself certain pleasures in the expectation of being rewarded in eternity for the self-denial practised here. But the great philosopher did not take into account the personal question. The true Christian practices no self-denial when he stays away from worldly amusements. He would not be happy if he indulged in them. If his heart is set on attaining the highest spiritual standard, he can find no pleasure in the shuffling of cards, or in the gyrations of the ballet-dancer. Life is too earnest, too serious for frivolous pleasures.

Are we then to have no relaxation, no amusement? Is life to be altogether work and service and devotion? By no means. The example of our Lord, who went to the wedding feast and accepted invitations to social meals, shows that he had no such idea of the Christian life. "Come ye apart and rest awhile," he said to his disciples. Rest and recreation are necessary to a healthy life. We gain strength for future service by relaxation and the retirement from labor for a time. It is recreation that is needed, not dissipation. That principle is the key to many inquiries that are made by young Christians. They ask, "May I dance?" "May I go to the theatre?" The test is in the results. Do such amusements tend to the development of the Christian life? Do they not rather deplete the spiritual powers and leave the person disinclined for prayer and Christian service? The Christian cannot afford to unfit himself for his chief occupation. The student knows very well that an hour spent in the gymnasium, or in a boat on the river, or in a game of chess is not lost. He comes back to his studies refreshed, the cobwebs are cleared from his brain and difficult problems are more easily solved. He has had recreation. The exhausted brain has had rest in the change of occupation and has gained new vigor. He is a stronger, more efficient man than he was before. Relaxation is necessary and is really an economy of the vital powers, but it should be of the right kind and should be chosen for that purpose. Amusements that wear on the strength, that produce exhaustion are not recreations, but debilitations. Every one can apply the test for himself and can prove by experience the kind of amusement that is helpful to him.

We are bound also to consider the effect of our indulgences on others. If the world sees that a Christian is obliged to come to the world for relaxation, it naturally concludes that there is not enough in his religion to make him happy. The intrinsic right or wrong of an amusement may be difficult to define, but if it brings a man into associations that are debasing, it will inevitably defile him. The continual blasphemy and profanity that is common in many circles have a tendency to dull the delicacy of the moral ear, and in the same way certain amusements deaden the conscience, and the world knows that decadence has set in when it sees the Christian indulging in them.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League, and Baptist Young People's Union for April 16. Glorifying God in our recreations. Ps. 16: 5-11; I. Cor. 10: 31.

Religious Books Wanted in Turkey

Missionary Mary Carter Dodd, of Cesarea, Turkey in Asia, forwards to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a plea in behalf of a Circulating Library in the town of Tolas. It is doing an excellent work among the native population. Some of the books are printed by hand and duplicated on the hektograph. More books are greatly needed, and any contributions that will aid in extending the work will be greatly appreciated.

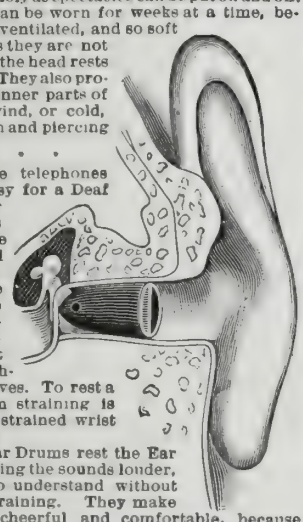
Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?
They make the Deaf hear distinctly.
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them.
And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.
Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers.
They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain off them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off.
And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.



These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.
Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.
This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.
Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.
A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.
Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.
Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.
This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.
Write for it today to the Wilson Ear Drum Co. 165 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

A MEAL WITH CHRIST

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

EVERY soul of man who hears of Christ must either believe on him and yield himself wholly up to him, or take his part against the Christ, the Son of the living God. Those who, like Judas, pose as his friends, while their hearts are after selfish interests, must, some time or other, be discovered and brought back. "That was the true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" (John 1: 9). The Jews clearly saw that if they believed on Jesus as the Messiah, it meant in the present, humiliation and nothingness to them. They who saw nothing of glory in the meek and lowly Jesus, who conquered by submitting, and who, without any acceptation by the great ones of this world, yet proved himself Master of all the resources of nature, and of death itself, were not likely to lose all in this world for the hope of future glory at his hands.

Wherever there are found a few really trustful, really obedient children of God, there the Lord is free to do his mighty works; and mighty things do happen. But wherever the Lord makes bare his arm, there the enemy, in his mad rage, and hate of the Son of God, will do his utmost to stop the testimony, to spoil or to silence in some way the witnesses to the truth, and to assert himself as "the prince of this world." Let us never forget that we tread on an enemy's ground, conquered, indeed, to every step of faith and obedience, but full of pitfalls and snares to the unwary. God gives "places to walk" (Zech. 3: 7) to everyone who walks in faith and obedience to him; "none of his steps shall slide" (Ps. 37: 31).

A wonderful picture is that in this twelfth chapter of John. The Jews' Passover was nigh at hand; the chief priests and Pharisees had given commandment that if any one knew where Jesus was, he should show it, that they might take him (John 11: 55-57). And now the Lamb of God knew that his time was come. He no more sought to hide himself. "Jesus therefore (R. V.), six days before the Passover came to Bethlehem, where Lazarus was, whom Jesus raised from the dead" (John 12: 1). It was the very house where he would be most likely to be found. There they made him a supper; and Martha served; but Lazarus was one of them that sat at the table with him." What a company! Jesus the Messiah, the son of God; the Lamb appointed to be slain, in his wondrous grace, sharing for the last time a family meal with those of whom it was written, "Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus."

"Thus saith the High and Holy One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy, I dwell in the high and holy place; with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones" (Isa. 57: 15). Here they were, the humble, broken ones, and Jesus, the meek and lowly, the High and Lofty One, was at home with them, and they with him. Martha served, Lazarus sat at meat with Jesus, eating with him, and accepting from Martha service with him, sharing with the Saviour. But it was no more the old Lazarus; he had passed through death, and was risen with Christ—i. e., by virtue of his coming resurrection—and he lived now by the word of Jesus, not by his own natural life. It was not said of Lazarus, as of the child of the widow of Sarepta, that the spirit of the child entered into him again.

Mary had now a new vocation. She had passed the grade in the school of faith when she had learned to put the hearing of the Word of Christ before any service she could render to him. But now there was something new—Jesus had declared himself to be the Resurrection and the Life—she had seen the majesty of his power over death when her brother arose from his four days' subjection to "the last enemy." Now his coming sufferings and his subsequent resurrection were lit up to her by the Spirit of God. She took a pound of ointment of spikenard, very costly, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped his feet with her hair. Jesus read her heart with its deep adoration, which took in what his coming sacrifice and coming triumph meant for her and for other sinners, and she read his heart, which accepted her deep adoration.

WRITING HIS SERMON IN THE TROPICAL JUNGLE

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

J. N., Albany, N.Y. What is the creed of Mandaznarism, and who are its leaders?

It was not heard of, in this country at least, until quite recently, when a so-called Persian high priest appeared in New York, and began to make converts. His followers were chiefly light-headed, thoughtless, rich women, lovers of fashions and fads. As far as can be learned, the creed is a jumble of absurdities, and the mixture of hypnotism, faith cure, and Oriental fakirism. Devotees must fast frequently, and always abstain from meats; they believe the soul is located in the spine; that by living underground, their spiritual leaders (who are gods) attain to ages of several hundreds of years; and much similar rubbish. The whole affair is a religious "freak," and does not deserve the serious consideration due to a recognized system.

L. C. P., Middletown, N.Y. Have we a national flower? If so, what is it?

Nearly all the States have adopted a State flower, by State legislation or by vote of the public schools of the respective States. We have not heard of any national flower. The Rose is the State flower of New York.

M.J.P., New Brunswick, Can. We do not see why such questions should need to be asked. To apply Sunday School funds to an improper use, to indulge in a frivolous display of jewelry, to pretend to be a Christian, and yet be a frequenter and defender of theatres, all these things are so clearly wrong that we are surprised that any one should need to be advised about them.

T. J. B., Nolensville, Tenn. Why did the different nations choose the Hague wherein to build the Temple of Peace? Would not the threshing floor of Ornan have been the most suitable place?

They selected the Hague, first, for the reason that Queen Wilhelmina generously placed a suitable building at their disposal when no other ruler made any offer of hospitality; second, because little Holland was neutral, or at least nowise involved in any of the quarrels of the time, and, finally, because the location was central, which could not be said of Palestine.

Mrs. R. McC., O'Fallon, Mo. Where may I find the poem beginning, "'Twas the night before Christmas?"

The poem is entitled, "A visit from St. Nicholas," by Clement C. Moore, and will be found in almost any popular collection.

Enquirer, Newburgh, N. Y. Who was Sojourner Truth? What were some of her characteristics? What was her history?

Sojourner Truth was a slave woman who lived in Hurley, Ulster County, N. Y. In 1811 an act of legislature liberated all the slaves that were forty years of age. Certain others were to go free in 1828, while all children were to be free on reaching the age of 21. Isabella, as she was then known, belonged to Col. Ardenburg at the time of the passing of this act, but was subsequently twice sold. Her last master promised to set her free in 1827, but did not keep his word, and Isabella left without his consent. It was then that she took the name of Sojourner Truth, given her, so she claimed, by the Lord. She traveled and became a powerful speaker and exhorter, though wholly untaught. She devoted her life to public meetings, and sought in every way within her power to reform individual lives and public policies. During the Civil War she was very active in behalf of colored soldiers. She conceived a plan of colonizing the freedmen in the West, and obtained many signatures to a petition to Congress, which took no action. Sojourner died in 1883, claiming at that time to be more than 100 years old.

L. A., Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. How many post-offices are there in the United States? 2. How much mail matter did they handle during the past year?

1. The whole number of post-offices at the close of the fiscal year June 30, 1904, was 71,131. Of these 5,365 were presidential offices, and 65,766 were of the fourth class. 2. The annual amount of postal matter that passes through the mails of the United States in a year, is estimated to be about 8,500,000,000.

Reader, Sewickley, Pa. 1. We know nothing whatever of the religious belief of the person mentioned. There are doubtless good men in every profession. Some people, however, make the mistake of calling every genial and agreeable individual "a good Christian." Speaking on general principles, the preacher who eulogizes the theatre in his pulpit, instead of preaching Christ, has mistaken his vocation. Such a one is pretty certain to be a doubtful guide in spiritual affairs.

T. S., Jones, Mich. Did Alexander the Great kill Clitus with his own hand, or did he order it done by his soldiers?

History simply records that he was slain by Alexander while the latter was drunk. Presumably the monarch gave the order to another.

E. M., Riverside, Pa., writes:

In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I read: "Is there any one who can carry his present employment into heaven?" One occupation surely man may take with him: Music. Though we may be deaf down here, we will be able to hear the song of the forty and four thousand up yonder. There will be music in heaven.

Belle F. DeL., Bristol. Can you tell me where to find the poems of Father Faber, who died some years ago, and who was the author of the lines,

There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea?

Funk & Wagnalls Company of New York publish a volume called, Library of Religious Poetry. It contains a number of Father Faber's poems and hymns.

K. A. A., Heath, Neb. 1. Is there any probability that the western hemisphere was inhabited before the Deluge? 2. What gives the scientists the reasons for presuming that the sun did not shine on earth, on account of constant mist, before the Deluge? 3. We all know that the thoughts come from the brain; then why is it that the Bible says, "From the heart goes out evil thoughts," etc.?

1. There are no means of determining this. 2. Purely scientific speculation, and cannot be otherwise. 3. The heart is regarded as the seat of the affections and the passions, which are what lead men astray usually.

Pansy, San Jose, Calif. Where can I find the words, "There's nothing true but heaven," and who is the author?

You will find this line in a poem by Thomas Moore, beginning, "This world is all a fleeting show for man's illusion given."

Miss Amelia Hoyt, Mt. Kisco, N. Y., writes:

I was much interested in Dr. Craft's reply to J. M. The time alloted to a Sunday School lesson is, indeed, as he says, brief. Still, perhaps it is possible, as it certainly is desirable, to teach at least a little of the Catechism along with the International Lesson. The Lesson Quarterly published by the Methodist Episcopal Church, and perhaps by other churches too, contains each week two or three questions and answers from the Catechism, simple, brief, and mainly in Scripture language. A very few minutes would suffice in which to recite them. Just to read them would be better than nothing. The course is comprised in a year. Repeated year after year, it would be likely to result in immense good both to heart and mind. J. M. asks, "What is the best way to conduct such a class?" A class namely of boys from ten to twelve years old. If it were my class, I should much desire for several reasons a sprinkling girls in it. One good way to conduct such a class, indeed any class, is to ask the members of it put aside all printed matter and to give, in tur one fact or thought from the lesson. This insur some preparation beforehand, which, of itself, is great advantage gained and, if I may use so lor a word in speaking of a juvenile class, will ofte result in a delightful symposium.

Subscriber, F. D. S., Wis. Where in the Bib does it say a self-murderer shall not ent the kingdom of heaven?

See John 3: 15, which is probably th passage meant. Self-murder, though nc specifically mentioned, is none the les murder. See also Acts 16: 28.

S. McD., Memphis, Tenn. What is the name the heroine in Tasso's greatest work?

We presume you refer to Erminia, daugh ter of the King of Antioch, who, as Tass relates, became a captive of the Crusaders Tancred gave her her liberty and restore to her her father's possessions She fell in love with Tancred and when the Crusaders besiege Jerusalem, she dressed in armor intending to go to the Christia camp, but she was discovere and fled to the Jordan, where sh hid among shepherds. She suc ceeded, however, in sending secret message to the Crusaders which greatly helped them in th war. Visiting the Crusader camp during the fighting, she foun Tancred wounded. She nurse him back to health. Her ulti mate fate is not disclosed.

Miss V. O. S., Sisseton, S.Dak. I mad the statement, in class one day that more people were killed b alcoholic drinks than by any othe cause. Some one else made th assertion that water has destroy ed more. Can you give figures?

The other person probably re ferred to the Flood. But you ar quite right in asserting that, i our own day, strong drink is the world's greatest evil, being pro ductive of a greater amount o crime, misery, degradation and disease than any other cause. See Prohibition Year Book for 1905, published by United Prohibition Press, Chicago, for full statistics.

A LITTLE BELGIAN MILKMAID

It is no uncommon sight in Belgian cities, and in rural districts as well, to see a milk vendor's wagon drawn by a big, strong, shaggy, good-natured dog. These faithful animals are used as intelligent helpers in a variety of ways, but probably in no other duty are they so much in evidence as when harnessed to the little milk-carts, alongside which walk the quaintly-dressed Belgian milkmaids, reminding one of very similar types in Holland and Northern France.

THE HOTEL ENTRANCE

A CHURCH WITH A HOTEL ANNEX

BEARING the name of America's greatest missionary to foreign lands, the Judson Memorial Church, in New York, has always kept the mission spirit active in its work. It stands on the south side of Washington Square, one of the few reminders, with its still stately mansions, of the days "when old New York was young." The district has changed from a fashionable residential quarter to one of business, and the greater portion of all the people who live within three quarters of a mile are making their home in boarding houses. The church has provided a spiritual home for these people, and has held its own despite the general trend toward the upper parts of the city. The sources of income of such a church are necessarily limited, and to support it a unique venture was started. A hotel called "The Judson" was built on the west and south sides, of the same light brick of which the church is constructed. Viewed from the vicinity of the Washington Arch, it presents quite an imposing appearance. Between the hotel and the church rises a stately tower, ten stories high, built in the Italian style, with an open loggia at the top.

The rent from The Judson hotel supports, in great part, the church and its various activities. It is the permanent home of many people engaged in business in New York, and, when possible, it accommodates transient guests. The service is up-to-date, and everything is supplied that could be found in a first class city hotel. The lower floor contains a handsome reception room, offices, telephone exchange, and three large dining rooms that accommodate 170 guests. Temperance, of course, is the absolute rule.

The building is seven stories in height, and has both single rooms and suites. An elevator runs to the top of the main building, but the upper three floors of rooms in the tower are reached by stairs. The tower rooms are the most popular in the hotel, and always in great demand.

As one gazes out from the building on the greensward of Washington Park, with its stately Arch on the other side, with its background of red houses, and hears the voices of children at play, with now and then the distant hum of a great city at work, it seems a very haven of rest, an oasis in a wilderness of brick and stone. The scheme of hotel and church combined, proved successful almost from its conception, and, regardless of the size of the collections, the Judson Memorial has been enabled to continue its work. This work is an absolute necessity, if hundreds of people who come to the metropolis to earn their living are to be kept true to their Christian standards. Its work is as much soul-keeping as soul-winning. It is for people far from home, who ordinarily would be church-goers and workers, but are liable to drop away from their former mode of life in the excitement and turmoil of a great city.

The church and first section of the hotel were erected in 1891. A large part of the money for its construction came from five and ten cent contributions of people all over the country who wished to honor the memory of Adoniram Judson. The interior of the edifice is one of the most beautiful in New York. It is finished in white marble, with large marble pillars. On each side are several large stained glass windows, that are the work of La Farge, and they are considered by art critics as some of his best work. Back of the pulpit is the baptistry. Over this is a tablet to the memory of Joseph Blachley Hoyt. It is the work of the famous American sculptor, Herbert Adams, and represents two angels holding a slab, on which is engraved the Biblical quotation ending with the words, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the earth."

The church supports a sewing-class for young women, which is in charge of a manager with about eight assistants. Once a week there is a gymnastic class for girls, and the boys have an active Boys Brigade. One of the branches of the Damrosch Choral Union holds its weekly meeting in the lower hall of the church, under the instruction of Sarah L. Dunning. The attendance is about eighty. There is also a large society of Christian Endeavor. One of the new interests of the church is the Deats Memorial Home for Children, at Summerville, N. J. It was started with a gift of $40,000 from Mrs. Elmira Deats of Flemington. The building has ample accommodation for eighty children, and has an efficient matron and staff. There is a hospital building separate from the main establishment. The church pays to the home the sum of $2,000 yearly, This amount is sufficient to support only twenty out of the eighty that could be brought up there if the required sum were forthcoming. The church wishes to establish a home for the aged and a fresh-air home. The regular weekly lectures on popular subjects, given under the auspices of the Board of Education of the city of New York, are held in the lower hall. At one time the church had a kindergarten of its own, but at present it gives two halls for the use of a kindergarten of the public school, and one conducted under the auspices of the Free Kindergarten Association.

REV. ADONIRAM JUDSON REV. EDWARD JUDSON

THE JUDSON MEMORIAL CHURCH, WASHINGTON SQUARE, NEW YORK

The presence of this memorial institution in the great metropolis has a peculiar fitness, as this city is the home of immigrants from all quarters of the earth. It speaks to them of one who turned aside from the comforts and advantages of American civilization, and so much that appeals to a young man of ardent ambition, to spend his active life in a remote land blighted with heathenism, and lacking in nearly all the conditions that ministered to material and intellectual satisfaction.

Judson's life as a missionary in Burmah, stamps him as one of the Christian heroes of the nineteenth century. The hardships he endured, spending two years in prison, the perils he encountered, and the work he did, despite the most adverse circumstances, revealed the possession of the daring and enduring qualities of which the world's martyrs are made. What he accomplished was of a pioneer nature, opening the way for easier and more effective methods. Mr. Judson not only created a discipleship among the Burmans, but he prepared a Burmese grammar, and translated a large body of religious literature into the Burmese tongue, all of which

"Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation"

OH, how quickly the "Wheel of Fortune" may whirl around. What we are to-day is no earnest of what we may be to-morrow. Rich and affluent, prosperous and happy now, that does not prove that we shall be rich and happy and prosperous, with a multitude of friends hanging around us next week, or next month, or next year. The night follows the day, as well as the day the night. The people living in the South American Republic of Chili reckon history by this or that or the other earthquake, which has made the heaving earth rock down homes and destroy whole cities and towns and villages. Some of us may reckon the passing away of our lives by the epitaphs upon the tombstones of our buried hopes.

"Year of 1872," we say, "oh, that was the year of America's awful Black Friday, when my fortune like a snowflake melted away in an hour. Year of 1881; that was the year I lost my brother, or wife, or mother. Year of 1905: that was the year I was injured in a railroad accident. On account of that broken hip, I lost my position at the store and had to give up my life insurance policy and become a poor, helpless invalid, a burden on my friends. Ah, I am not as I used to be. Once, I had enough for myself and for others. Now, I have less than nothing. I am dependent upon those around me."

The Joy of Sonship

Better days! Oh, yes, scores of you have seen better days, in your body, your property and your families. But, alas, many of us, like the writer of the words of my text, have seen better days in our spiritual condition. I do not know whether this author held, as do the Methodists of our day, that a good man might lose his hold on salvation; but one thing is sure, he knew that he had fallen from grace. He had once tasted the joys of divine sonship. He had once waded ankle deep, knee deep, waist deep, chin deep into the great depths of God's love, and had drunk of those living waters. But now, he has climbed out of those depths, and stands shivering upon the jagged rocks of evil in the cold, biting winds of sin. Thus, we find him crying out in the words of entreaty, "Oh, God, bring back to me the happiness and the exhilaration and peace of my past Gospel life. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation."

Have not some of us need to offer the prayer of the Psalmist? I know that there are many who are in the position of this Psalmist. I know, furthermore, that if you will only return, you may taste again the Gospel joys, and they will be sweeter to you than they ever were before. An eminent minister of the Cross a short time ago told me that the greatest blessing of a revival of religion was not found in introducing strangers to Jesus, but in bringing back to his service those who had once been found at the foot of the Cross. "And," said he, "when these wanderers return, they make the very best workers in our Christian churches." May God help me to prevail on some of you backsliders again to taste the Gospel joys.

Gratitude for Rescue

But I never did like praying for "Everything in general, and for the universe in particular." In order to be more explicit, we would divide the Psalmist's prayer under three or four distinct headings. In the first place I would have you make the prayer, "Return unto me, O Lord, the joy which I experienced when I first began to realize the heights and the depths and the lengths and the breadths of thy sacrifices for me. Restore unto me the joy which came to my soul when years ago, I first approached the Communion Table, and said, 'Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief.'" Then the tidal wave of happiness rolled over us in surges. Then we said to ourselves, "Saved by grace! Saved by grace! Oh God, I thank thee that I have been saved by grace."

Was it a marvelous fact, that at that time we should have been happy and have thanked God that we were saved by grace. Surely we would not treat God less gratefully than we would have treated any human being who had rescued us from a threatening danger. When at the battle of Brienne, Gen. Gourgaud flung himself before his chief, and killed the Cossack who was about to bury his lance in the heart of his Emperor, Napoleon's gratitude knew no bounds. Thus we feel grateful towards our human rescuers. We look with loving eyes towards the skilled surgeon, who drove the knife within a hair's breadth of the fatal artery and say, "He saved me! He saved me!" We throw our arms with a grateful, convulsive clasp about the neck of the strong swimmer, who breasted the waves and swam out to bring us to shore when we were sinking in the surf. We sound forth the praises of the man who leaps forward at the risk of his life and clutches the bridle of our runaway horse and hangs on, until the maddened brute stops his wild career, even though his own body is bruised by the plunging hoofs. Shall we not be thankful, sincerely and transcendently thankful, to God for saving us from the results of our evil deeds and sins? But, strange to say, after the divine rescue has been accomplished, our gratitude may cool. It may after awhile change into indifference, or even into positive repulsion.

The Joy of Service

Once our souls were aflame with gratitude for what God had done for us. No sooner were we converted, than, like the Psalmist, we cried out: "Evening and morning and at noon, will I pray and cry aloud, and He shall hear my voice." But after awhile, our joyful enthusiasm began to cool. We grew indifferent. We turned our backs upon God. We now find reading the Bible a bore, and praying a drudgery, and talking to Christ, and waiting for Christ to talk to us, a task, instead of an endless pleasure. Oh, my friends, do you want to feel again the exhilaration which came over you on the day of your conversion? Then make the prayer of my text. Make it day in and day out. Make it, and continue to make it, as you rehearse all God has done for you by the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Oh, that to-day we could have the thrill which surged through us when we first felt that God had purged us with hyssop, until we were clean, that he had washed us until we were whiter than snow.

But gratitude to God for what Christ has done for us, is not the only joy of salvation that is buried and needs to be renewed. One of these joys that needs to be resurrected, is the one we used to find in Christian service. No sooner were we converted, than immediately we went forth to try and save some one else. Then when we brought a brother or sister to the Cross, there came over us another joy which we had not hitherto conceived; the joy of saving men and women for Christ. There is no joy on earth greater than that. Not even the joy of being saved ourselves, can be compared to the joy of knowing that, by the grace of God, we have been able to save some one else from perishing.

The man of the world who has never experienced this joy cannot understand it. The exhilaration of it is couched for him in mystical and unknown tongues. For years and years I could not understand what Paul meant in his letter to the Romans. I felt he did not mean what he said. I believed he was only using an exaggerated oratorical figure of speech, when he said: "For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh." The more I studied that passage, the more I felt, and do feel to-day, that Paul literally made this prayer: "Oh, Christ, if there is no way to save my brothers, my sisters, my friends, my people, but by blotting my name out of the book of life, then destroy me for their sakes." In other words, Paul said: "Destroy me, if by my spiritual death others might spiritually live forever in Thee." And yet, is not this joyful willingness to be sacrificed to save others, experienced by the new convert always.

Self-Sacrifice

Oh, apostates; oh, ye negligent and slothful church-members, standing idly about in the market-places, when God's vineyards are filled with the ripest clusters, just ready for the plucking, you have known in the past the joy of salvation in the saving of souls. Why, I can see even now, the reflection of a past joy upon your faces, as in the time when you used to labor in the Sunday Schools, and bring little children to Christ. I can see you now, smiling as you used to do when you brought your friends to the revival meetings, and labo with them to accept Christ. I can see you now, go up to your minister and earnestly and rapturously s ing: "Pastor, keep on praying. We will get the they are bound to give their hearts to Christ; we v get them yet." But now the world and the flesh h crept in. You do not work for souls as you used to You do not have the old joy of saving souls. Oh, friends, will you not pray that this joy may come you again. "Lord, God, give me the old thrill of be saved by thy sacrifice. But do more than this, Lo Give me the joy of saving some one else for thee. I be necessary, in order that others may spiritually li that I must spiritually die, then, as Paul wished, me die for thine honor and glory."

Christian Associations

But in this Psalmist's prayer we would find anoth joy. It is this: "Oh, God, restore unto me the joy Christian fellowship with Christians. Oh, God, ma me again love church services, and the prayer-meetin and the missionary gatherings, and the convocation the young people of the Christian Eudeavorers a Epworth Leagues and the Brotherhood of Andrew a Philip. Oh, God, may I desire to associate with t disciples more than to go with any other class of peop on earth." You think this is a strange prayer to mak I do not. When I make it, I know that one of t surest signs of the true Christian life is to be found the desire of a Christian to be where other Christia are. Yet, if I mistake not, some of you never go the mid-week prayer-meetings, or to our Sunday School or to our cottage prayer-meetings. You look up these meetings as a bore, a drudgery, a tiresome hou wasted for duty's sake. When you go to these mee ings you do so under protest.

"Yes," you answer, "I do look upon these religio gatherings as a bore. But I am not responsible for m likes and dislikes, any more than I am to be blam because my favorite color is blue, my favorite flower carnation, my favorite musician Beethoven, my favori novelist Thackeray, my favorite artist Rubens, and m favorite poet Longfellow or Tennyson. I like what like, and dislike what I dislike, and I cannot help i Now, if I dislike to associate with the class of peop who make up our distinctively religious gatherings, suc as are found in the missionary society, I am not to blam I am no more to blame than I am because I dislik codfish or mackerel, and like apples and grape fruit.

Acquired Tastes

Ah, yes, my brother, you are to blame. You are in dividually responsible for your likes and dislikes. I you do not care to associate with Christian people i Christian gatherings, then it is high time that yo learned to enjoy their society, and the quicker th better. Because I do not love them now, that is no ex cuse why I should not learn to love these people. Sup posing I was a dyspeptic. Supposing I had for year been living on lobsters and veal and ham and pork an cabbage and highly-seasoned salads and rich pastries Supposing, on account of my dyspepsia, I was sent t a sanitarium. What would be the first order of m physicians? "Put that man on the simplest diet." Be cause I tell my physician I do not like plain toast an milk and cold bread and good, wholesome beefsteak and potatoes, would that make any difference? No My physician would reply: "Then the sooner you learn to like them the better. You have a diseased appetite You must develop a healthy appetite for good, whole some, simple foods."

Now, my Christian friend, by the same law, you may have a diseased spiritual appetite for spiritual associa tion. If you cannot find enjoyment in communion wit Christian people, then the sooner you learn how to en joy their society the better. You are exactly in the position of the frivolous girl, or the dissipated boy, growing up in a Christian home. Such children are never happy unless they are off at some party, or visiting some neighbor, or attending some theatre. But after awhile they will find that the sweet, gentle fellowships of a Christian home, offer the best kind of enjoy-

THE YOUNG CHINESE FARMER RIDING THE HARROW

M. E. HOSPITAL AND HOMES AT IH CHI SHAN, WUHU, CHINA

A LITTLE MISSIONARY TOUR IN CHINA

NOT long ago, I had the privilege of taking a long inland missionary journey, and I am sure the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be interested in hearing about it.

We had our house-boat, The Christian Herald, brought to the landing in front of the Wuhu custom-house, while we put aboard some provisions for the trip. It was a beautiful day and the water was as smooth as glass; but as the current in the Yang-tsz runs at a four-knot pace, we soon dropped down to the mouth of the Chao River, eight miles below Wuhu. From here we had a fair wind until we reached Huang-lo-ho. Here we stopped and held a preaching service in our chapel.

Next morning, we set sail for Chao Hsien. This city is beautifully situated on a gentle sloping hill, overlooking the Chao Lake. It is about sixty miles from Wuhu. This city has launches running from it to Wuhu and Lu Cheo-hu, and thus is a very busy, prosperous town. We stopped over Sabbath with the people there and had a most blessed time. All of the Christians here have been gathered in since the flood. There are now over sixty Christians in that city.

On Monday morning, we left our house-boat and went overland by foot to Han Shan, Chin Chi and Tao-Kia. The air was very bracing and we enjoyed the walk, and meeting the Christians in different places. We returned to Wuhu, after traveling over a hundred miles.

At this time of the year one can see every few miles immense flocks of ducks, which are being brought up from farm to farm and driven to the best market. I have seen thousands in one flock. As we walk along, we come to a man pumping water up on another field. It looks like fun to turn the cranks, but one finds after a few moments there is not much fun about it. In the next field, you will see a boy riding a small harrow, drawn by an ox. He seems very happy as he slowly rides on. The ploughs, harrows and all farm implements are as primitive as they were when Jesus walked through Palestine.

We in time reached the banks of the Yang-tsz and passed over in a large, open boat. The river here is over two miles wide. Near the river is a temple. Very often we visit these temples and preach to the priests or to people who may be visiting there. As we near Wuhu, we come to a narrow foot-bridge over a deep stream. The bridge was shaky and we were almost afraid to cross over. We soon reached Ih-Chi-Shan, a hill two miles outside Wuhu. The Methodist Mission Hospital and houses are here. The hill and surrounding country are very pleasing to the eye.

We are glad we have had the privilege of being able to reach these people with the Gospel. Pray for this needy circuit. Z. CHARLES BEALS.

DRIVING HIS GEESE TO MARKET BY LAND AND WATER

Your letter of January 3d, with ten dollars inclosed for our work here, came to hand last mail. Thanks for this remembrance. I applied it to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD House-boat Fund. We have found this boat (named after your paper), to be a real blessing to us, for without it our long inland trips would be very trying. Possibly some of the readers of your good paper may see their way to helping to keep a preacher on the boat all the time. This would only cost about ten dollars per month, including the boatman's wages. He then could go from city to city preaching Christ. I know of no better way of scattering the seed of the Kingdom. I trust this may yet be done. China is intersected with water-ways, including large ditches, canals and rivers with cities and large towns very near together, making it convenient for the evangelist to reach them. Pray that this work may be sustained and enlarged.

ment. The quiet reading of a book by the glowing hearth in the sitting-room is one. The loving caress of a mother's or a wife's hand is another. The playful prattle of a little child, the quiet prayer, the sweet memories of long years that are past, are others. The hopes of the years to come, being talked over, offer the highest joys this side of heaven. Oh, man, do not think that associating with men of the world offers to you the acme of pleasure. If you cannot find any enjoyment in the fellowship of Christian people then the sooner by the grace of God you kill your diseased spiritual appetite, the better for your own enjoyment and the better for your life.

But in order to fully grasp the beauty of the Psalmist's prayer, you must remember that it is given with the absolute knowledge that in his own strength he was nothing, but that in God's strength, he could be everything. David at this time, was standing under the shadows of his past sins. God had blessed him again and again. Yet, just after these many manifestations of the divine love, he had fallen back into sin, because he had depended upon his own strength. Thus, David says: "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation and uphold me by thy free spirit." That means in plain English, "Oh, God, bring me back to thy loving grace: cleanse me from sin, and then, by thy power, do not let me again wallow in the quagmires and the bogs and the filth of evil." After David had played the fool in King Achish's court and had murdered Uriah, to steal for himself Uriah's wife, ought he not to have made this prayer with fear and trembling? After you and I have sinned again and again, when God had restored unto us the joy of his salvation, ought not we make this prayer in the same spirit as David made it?

It is only by doubting and continuing to distrust our own strength, that we are led to rely entirely upon God's protecting power. I would have us feel our dependence on God, when we make this prayer, exactly as the little adopted daughter of a dear friend of mine feels towards her father. He is a noble man, made noble through suffering. He started out in humble financial circumstances, but he went on and on in life, until, at last, he won a position of wealth and influence. But after the wealth came, then came the sorrow. God came to his two little girls, and said: "Come, daughters! Come! I want you to play in the green field of heaven!" And, in a night, the earthly nursery was emptied for the celestial playgrounds. Broken-hearted were my friend and his dear wife. The cry of their agonizing hearts were: "Oh, God, give us a little girl!" And God gave them a little daughter, not of their own flesh and blood, however, but a little girl, who came out of a hovel of poverty and filth and sin. Some months ago, this little girl was in a Foundling Institute in one of our large Eastern cities. By this institution she was sent West, and put into a low Mexican's home of ignorance and filth. There my friend found her, and said: "She shall not remain here. She shall come and be my daughter, and live in my home." He took her West. Then he and his wife washed the little girl, and put clean clothes upon her, and put her into a clean, white bed. They surrounded her with all that wealth and love could give. Yet, though that little girl is now only about two and one-half years old, she lives in continual terror of being taken back to her past surroundings. Every night before she goes to bed, she calls her foster-father to her side, or crawls up into his lap, and puts her little arms about his neck, and says: "Papa, you won't let them come and take baby away, will you?" Sometimes she awakes at night, and calls and asks the same question: "You won't let them take baby away, will you?" And the great, strong man, with tears in his eyes, says: "No, baby; no, daughter! I will not let them come and take you away from me and mamma! Go to sleep now; papa will keep you safely by his side!" So David, as a heart-broken sinner, just reaches up and puts his arms up in plea to God, and says: "Oh, Father, keep me. Don't let me go back to sin as I have done in the past. Keep me, Lord. Keep me in the power of thy love." Can you not say to him now: "Keep me, Lord. Keep me, Father. Keep me"?

Thus my friends, because you have again and again come to Christ and tasted of the joy of salvation and then fallen away, do not let your broken resolutions keep you away from the Saviour to-day. First, get a clean sheet. Say, "Oh, God forgive." Then make a prayer, an earnest prayer, which will be a continuous prayer for every morning, noon and night. Let this be your prayer: "Oh, God, keep me. Keep me. Oh, Lord, keep me every step I go." And God will keep you, brother. He will keep you under the shadow of his wings. He will keep you as David was kept. Will you make the prayer of my text now? Will you continue to make the earnest prayer, "Uphold me with thy free spirit" until at last he delivers you forever from all sinful temptations, at the great White Throne?

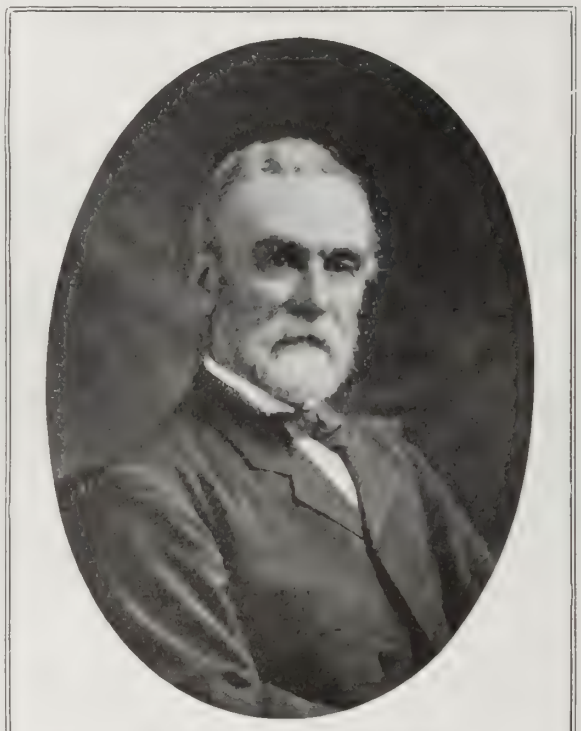
A VALIANT WORKER CALLED HOME

FROM India comes the sad news of the death of the Rev. Richard Winsor, of Sirur. Were it not that we know that life and death are in the hands of the wise and loving Father, who does not willingly afflict nor grieve the children of men, we should deplore the removal of a man so useful, as a calamity. We cannot understand the dispensation, but we know that He doeth all things well. At this time the loss is peculiarly severe. Mr. Winsor was singularly successful in the management of the industrial development, which is at this juncture the hope of India. He was a pioneer in the industrial work, and had thoroughly organized it at Sirur, and had devised plans for further development, which he was hoping to execute. But he has been called away, and the vacancy he leaves it will be hard to fill.

Mr. Winsor was of a singularly hopeful, cheerful temperament. In the darkest days of the famine, he could look beyond, to the harvest of souls that he was convinced would result from the relief work that was being done. No man so thankful as he for the means placed at his disposal for the relief of the famine-stricken people. With wise and far-seeing skill he planned the digging of wells and the making of roads so as not to pauperize the people. He supervised the work, paying the laborers, and going out to the villages to relieve those who were too old or too weak to work. Day by day he labored with indefatigable energy and doubtless saved hundreds of lives. We remember well his coming afterwards to this office and telling us, with tears in his eyes, of the suffering of the people and of the joy it had been to him to relieve it. He begged us to thank our readers for the gifts that had made such relief possible. It was a great pleasure to him to go out on the Quito and to help in the distribution of the corn with which that good ship was laden. His interest in that effort, his delight as he saw the bags of corn being stowed away in the hold was good to witness. At the farewell meeting on board he almost broke down in his address of grateful acknowledgment and his voice was choked with emotion. That was the last sight we had of his bright, cheery face.

On his arrival in India, he wrote time and again telling us of his plans. He entered heart and soul into the work among the orphans. He had gathered over two hundred poor little half-starved creatures, and when he heard that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would enable him to keep them, and provide the funds for supporting and educating them, his gratitude knew no bounds. He planned for them a thorough training, and spared no pains to devise means for making them self-supporting. He had them taught carpentry, blacksmithing, and other trades. His eager, resourceful mind, was continually busy in new schemes for their betterment. His plan of teaching the younger boys ropemaking was new in mission work, and he invented a plan of turning the aloe fibre to account, and had a plantation to produce the material. Dr. Liston, one of the Government inspectors who visited the Mission, was delighted with the work. He wrote afterwards: "What a useful life you and Mrs. Winsor lead; what a blessing you are to the people to whom you have devoted your life and your talents. I have nev seen anywhere such useful work do in India. I wish I was a rich man a could help to advance your work. would have the full assurance th every anna would be productive of t greatest amount of good possible."

THE MACHINE SHOP IN THE SIRUR ORPHANAGE



THE LATE REV. RICHARD WINSOR

Similar testimony was given by D A. W. Thompson, of the College Science, who reported that he w "very much pleased with the wor done by the boys. The work set b me for examination was thoroughl done. The school is in excellent form. Col. O. H. Channer, I. M. S., who als inspected the school, said: "This certainly the most interesting and hop ful school I have seen during m twenty-five years touring in India. M Winsor and his wife have my earnes wishes and sympathies in their splen did work."

It was a delight to know that whil the spiritual and religious side of th work was well kept up, this prac tical and commercial side elicited such warm praise fro the public officials. One and another went long dis tances to see how the school was managed, and urge Mr. Winsor to write a book describing his methods The British Government finally recognized the value o the American missionary's services, and conferred upo him the Silver Medal of the Kaiser-i-Hind Order.

To the last, Mr. Winsor remembered most gratefully the help he had received, and was eager to thank ou readers for their generosity. In one of his letters h said, "The result of all these beneficences, whic through the gifts of your readers we were enabled t render, are truly wonderful. Never was there seen i India, since missionary work began there, such a turn ing of the hearts of the people toward Christian truth Our reception in a village now is very different fro what it was before the famine. Cordiality and friend liness and respectful attention have taken the place o sullen hostility and we are everywhere recognized as th benefactors of the people. I have long wanted to tel the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who so nobly came to our relief in our time of dire need, how muc good was accomplished by their beneficence, how thank ful the people were for their gifts, and to personally thank them for enabling us to show practically to the non-Christian population how blessed and compassionate a faith Christianity is."

Mr. Winsor had been in ill-health for some time. Twenty-six years of labor, so exhausting in that debilitating climate, had worn him down. He had been cautioned repeatedly by the physicians against continuing his labor, but he had plans that he was anxious to carry to perfection; besides which, he was devoted to the people among whom he had labored so long. Unmindful as ever of himself, he continued his work until the heart, weakened by his long service, gave way, and an attack of heart failure laid the strenuous worker to rest. Like his Master, he had given his life for others.

MEN AND WOMEN OF THE HOUR

EUGENE YSAYE, the world-famed violinist, has been making a tour of the United States, and has been received with great enthusiasm by the music loving public. He was born in Liege, Belgium, but is of Walloon descent. He studied first at the Conservatoire of Liege. Later he was a pupil of Wieniawski, at Brussels. Next to his violin, his greatest interest is in cycling and in fishing.

MR. H. W. GOODE is the President of the Lewis and Clark Exposition that is to open soon at Portland, Ore. It is to commemorate the exploration of the Northwest by these intrepid pathfinders. Portland has been arranging for it for several years, and the buildings, as well as the plans for the entertainment of visitors, are on a magnificent scale. Thirty-four conventions will hold their meetings there. At the present moment Mr. Goode and his associates have every prospect of conducting one of the most successful Expositions ever held in the West.

MISS ADELENE MOFFAT is the General Secretary of the Home Culture Clubs. This important movement was begun seventeen years ago, by Mr. George W. Cable, the novelist. At the present time there are one hundred and eight clubs in existence. Starting in the city of Northampton, Mass., the idea has been copied, with some variations in scope, in many States. At first the clubs were composed merely of a few neighbors, who came together for reading and discussion.

DR. EDWIN ANDERSON ALDERMAN is to be inaugurated this month as the first president of the University of Virginia. Although the Institution was founded by Thomas Jefferson, it has never had a president, the Chairman of the Faculty discharging, to a certain extent, the executive functions. Dr. Alderman has made a fine record as an educator in the South, and under his leadership the university cannot fail to take a great step forward in usefulness.

VESPASIAN WARNER has just been appointed by President Roosevelt as Commissioner of Pensions. He is a veteran of the Civil War, a graduate of the Law Department of Harvard University, and has a wide business and Congressional experience. His selection has given great satisfaction in Washington, as well as to the country at large. The position is one of the most important in the public service outside of the Cabinet. Last year the department had 996,545 pensioners on the rolls.

BABIES READY FOR BAPTISM AT UMTALI MISSION CHURCH

A NEW STYLE OF PICK-A-BACK—MONKEY AND PIG

THE BRIGHT SIDE OF MISSIONARY LIFE

ON our way out of Natal, a fellow-passenger on the steamer told me that he understood that a missionary is "one of those chaps who do not have too much to do." As this passenger had been very busy on board, spending over $200 in drink and gambling, in the voyage of a fortnight, I suppose he felt above us. While it is true we do not have much to do in that line, such an idea of a missionary is about as erroneous as the popular one that he is chiefly to be seen under a spreading tree, preaching to crowds of naked savages.

Not that we may not often be seen there, as the photograph which I send shows. It is a snap-shot of Dr. Sidney Strong of the American deputation, preaching to a thousand Zulus under a tree at Amanzimtoti. But this was a rare occasion, and he is a rare missionary. The rest of us may also sometimes be caught in similar acts; but it cannot be said that it is our most common experience.

There probably is no calling in the world in which there is a greater variety of experiences, and in which one is not liable to get involved in a great deal more work than one man can do, than that of a missionary. Here is a certain missionary who may be taken as a fair sample of others. He is chairman of a committee for revising the Bible. He sits at his desk, which is deluged with books—Greek, Hebrew, English, and Zulu, lexicons, grammars, commentaries, concordances, and versions of Scripture in various languages. Eight hours a day he gives to this study. But this is only a part of his work. He is landlord and rent collector for forty tenants on three farms, and general superintendent of fourteen churches and congregations, aggregating more than a thousand members, not to speak of marriages, funerals, correspondence, etc. All this goes on the whole year round, as there is very little opportunity for vacation to the faithful missionary while in the field. He may go camping out for a change; but he is not idle. He improves the opportunity to prepare some important papers, and sets up his typewriter in the jungle, where he will not be interrupted as he is at home. It is not to be wondered that missionaries need furlough. Nevertheless, there is variety in his work, if one can keep full of the Spirit, and not oblivious to the humorous side, as well as the woes of heathenism. A missionary's life need not be short or unhappy.

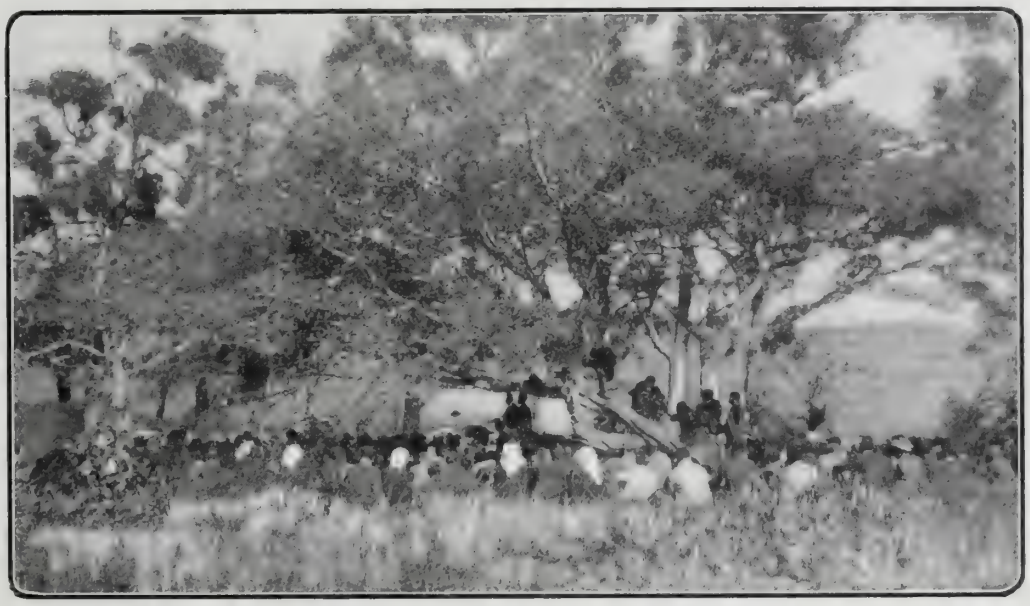
Take a Sunday morning, as he sits in his study preparing for the morning service. He has been praying long and fervently for a message to give to his people that day, and now, trusting that he has received it, the lines of care spread over his brow as he tries to think of the best way to impress it upon the congregation. He looks away out of the open door. Just then, an old black hen whose family aspirations have been cruelly broken off, goes clucking across the scene. Involuntarily the missionary's thought turns from the sublime subject of his sermon, to wondering what took all that hen's eggs. Was it a dog, or an iguana,* or some other animal from the bush? The hen passes along, and the missionary tries to catch up the broken thread of thought. But just then there is an outcry. The dog barks, and the native servants cry out, and the missionary catches up an assegai from a collection of curios, and rushes out to see what is the matter.

"It is an iguana." But it has disappeared.

"Where is it?"

"It has gone into the bushes." But no, the dog Teddie seems to have found the trail, which leads off into the paddock. The dog leads on and the missionary follows.

"Ah, there he is, the old rascal! The fellow who has been taking our eggs. Hit him! kill him." The pursuers gain and the missionary gives him a jab with his spear. Then the chase goes the other way. The beast turns on missionary and dog, and they both run. But the missionary in running backward catches his heel in the grass, and down he goes, and the "varmint" mounts him, snapping viciously at his legs. In the meantime, the dog makes it interesting for the other end of the animal, which gives the missionary time to get to his feet, and he returns to the charge. This time a successful blow severs one of the animal's legs. The spear is broken, but the beast is now hors de combat and is soon dispatched, and the missionary returns to his study and his sermon. The snap-shot was taken the next morning, when Johnny held the beast up by the tail.



DR. STRONG PREACHING, HIS PULPIT BEING UNDER THE TREES

HOW THE MISSIONARIES CAMP OUT

Still more troublesome animals are the monkeys, and we have experiences with them too. It seems like murder to shoot them, they look so human. But with the natives, it is to choose between shooting a few monkeys, or allowing their own children to go hungry for the loss of their garden fruits.

So I lent my gun to one of the natives and he brought me the skins. One day, he brought us a baby monkey, which had fallen from its mother's arms as she scampered away. He took at once to our youngest boy, and clung to him as to his own parent, and we brought him up on tinned milk. Soon he was one of the family. When we would go out for a walk, he would go along with us. When the children would stop to pick a flower, he would pick flowers too. When we would stand to view the scenery, he would stand too and shade his eyes with his hands. He seems very human in that way. If he would see the children reading a book, he would get a book and turn over the pages, and every page he turned would be torn. He had the habit, too, of jumping right into the middle of the table while we were eating, and running off with something. At last we could stand it no longer, and we had to keep him tied up where he could amuse himself with playing with the dog, or riding the pig about. But he sometimes gets loose, and then there is a time!

The missionary is teaching his Bible class in the church, with the window open, and he is telling how the Lord exhorted Joshua to be strong and of good courage. But he only gets as far as "Josh—" when plunk comes the monkey right in the middle of his desk, and looks at him. The brute did not jump the whole distance from the window; he took in the top of a seat, and the head of a native on his way, so quickly that it seemed like one long jump. The missionary was flustered for a minute, till he called a servant to take the animal away.

The chase after the iguana, the sudden appearance of the monkey in the class, and even his riding on the back of the pig, can all be used with excellent effect in preaching to these natives.

But surely, you say, there must be little occasion for such an illustration as the latter. On the contrary, it is a most effective illustration which is often needed in reconciling differences between church members. If two such animals can make friends and get along together, how much more the members of the Body of Christ.

A Temperance Advance

THAT the cause of temperance is making substantial progress on educational lines has recently been made evident in a very striking manner, by a report of the Bureau in charge of Temperance Instruction in American Schools and Colleges. In that report it is announced that a committee, representing fifteen thousand members of the medical profession in Great Britain, has decided to adopt, practically in its entirety, the American Course of Study in Hygiene and Temperance in the British schools, and that within a very short time every local School Board in that kingdom will be using the same syllabus of study on this subject that is now employed in our elementary schools.

This is at once a signal triumph for temperance, and a deserved recognition of America's leadership in this special branch of educational reform. It is difficult to estimate the great good that must result. A year ago, a Royal Commission, reporting to Parliament on physical deterioration in Britain, said:

> The Committee believe that more may be done to check the degeneration resulting from drink, by bringing home to men and women the fatal effects of alcohol on physical efficiency, than by expatiating on the moral wickedness of drinking.

Following this report, the representative medical men of the United Kingdom joined in signing a petition for the compulsory school study of hygiene and temperance. The response received is probably without parallel in the British post-office. In a single day eight thousand signatures were received by mail, and were carried by a special staff of postmen. For days the deluge continued. Then the doctors of all the medical schools — and including practically every distinguished member of the profession—got together to help save the rising generation from the degradation of alcohol, by teaching the young of both sexes the plain, unvarnished truth about the curse which has afflicted all "civilized" lands, their own included, almost from time immemorial. In doing this, the leaders of the reform in Britain are following the plain path which our own temperance reformers have laboriously, but successfully blazed—the path to national sanity and sobriety, to health and prosperity.

Now, if ever, is the opportunity of the press, the pulpit, and the various temperance organizations in our own land to urge forward the war on alcohol with vigor and determination. While the campaign of enlightenment goes on in the schools, and in local State and National legislation, the crusade against the sin of alcoholic indulgence should be winning its adult converts in our churches and Rescue Missions, and reclaiming thousands from the slavery of drink. Rich and poor are equally interested in this war for national sobriety, and there should be no lack of means to press it to advantage at all points, and under divine blessing, to ultimate success.

Golden Slavery

THERE comes a time in many a man's experience when he realizes that the race for mere riches involves too great a sacrifice. To some it means the crucifixion of nearly all that is admirable in character—of those finer qualities which, developed on proper lines, go to the making of a noble and upright manhood.

Others, who carry their observation still further, perceive the great truth that in the accumulation of wealth, a point may be reached at which the man ceases to be the master of his fortune, and becomes its slave. It binds him with chains which he is powerless to break, and compels him to regulate his life in accordance with its despotic interests. He is no longer free to do as he wills, or as honor and conscience direct. He may have pictured to himself a time when he should take his ease, and enjoy the leisure, the dignity, and the esteem which he supposed would come with affluence; but his dream is unrealized. His time, his thoughts, and his acts belong inexorably to his gold. It hedges him about on all sides, and he has to maintain a constant warfare, to preserve it from a horde of depredators. He feels the galling yoke of a golden slavery, from which there seems to be no escape.

Is the picture overdrawn? Ask any of our very rich men, and they will frankly tell you that their money "keeps them busy." "I get my board and clothes and little else," says one modern Crœsus. "It is true," said Mr. Carnegie, at a recent public gathering in New York, "that men do not own millions; it is the millions that own the men."

"He that trusteth in his riches shall fall," wrote Solomon, and true it is now as then that they neither satisfy the eye nor the heart. They are too apt to choke the spiritual nature of man, and unless God's grace fills the heart and directs the life, great wealth becomes to its possessor a snare and a source of positive moral and material danger. The competence of honest industry, the reward of diligence and thrift, bring content, and enable the possessor to become a blessing to others. This happy condition the owner of vast wealth rarely knows. Unless his spiritual nature is awakened and his eyes are opened to the real meaning and purpose of things, he may remain to the end the slave of his millions.

The Dead Missionary

SAD is the news that comes from India, of the death of the Rev. Richard Winsor, of Sirur. Such men as he leave the world poorer when they pass away. At THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office he was well known, and the value of his work appreciated. How earnestly he labored, how intelligently he planned, how faithfully he devoted himself to the interests of his charges, was seen and recognized by all who came in contact with him. In India, his work won the praise of the officials, and was acknowledged by the British Government, which conferred on him the gold medal of "Distinguished Service." During the famine, his labors were incessant, and since the famine he was untiring in devising plans for the permanent benefit of the orphans, whom our readers supported. He was a pioneer in industrial education, striving indefatigably to give the youths under his care efficient training. The people of India had in him a valuable friend and Christ a faithful servant.

We can imagine some worldling regarding such a life as Mr. Winsor's as wasted. Talents such as his, and labor such as he gave to the mission cause, if they had been given to business, would have produced a large fortune. They were consecrated to Christ and to humanity. Were they wasted? Let the natives whom he trained for the Master and fitted for a honorable independent life on earth, answer. They owe to him all that they have and are. For them he toiled and thought and denied himself. In their conversion and in their material prosperity he found his reward, and was satisfied. Always bright and cheerful and enthusiastic, he never referred to the sacrifices he was making, but was always absorbed in his work and its success. Like his Master, his life was laid down for others. Can there be any higher value to any life? At the close of lives that the world calls successful, all the fruits of labor must be laid down for the heirs to scramble over, and the poor, indigent soul goes unwelcomed into the presence of its Lord; but when such a man as he whom we mourn, comes to the dark river, the blessings of those he succored who were ready to perish, follow him, and from the other bank comes the greeting, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Among the Workers

—MRS. A. S. STEELE, founder of the Steele Home for Needy Children, Chattanooga, Tenn., writes: "It will be twenty-one years on the 26th of next month since our Home was founded. God has been very good to us. Doubtless the Lord will continue to provide. He has so wondrously cared for us hitherto."

—THE PRESBYTERS of Washington, D. C., recently arranged for special meetings for two weeks. These have just been concluded in the Assembly's Presbyterian Church. A house-to-house work was organized, and is going on actively. The prayers of Christians are requested on behalf of the work.

—EVANGELIST E. P. LOOSE has been conducting, lately, a series of meetings in the Presbyterian Church at Whitehall, Ill. The town is known throughout Central Illinois as a hotbed of free-thinkers. The revival was union in character. Many of the leading citizens arose and renounced their free-thinking for the Lord Jesus Christ. The transformations in some cases were wonderful, particularly among the aged.

How She Values The Great Hereafter

That valuable book, The Great Hereafter, reached me this morning. I examined very carefully the illustrations, print and reading matter, and I must say I am delighted with the whole make-up of this beautiful volume. I shall prize it above all other volumes that fill my book-shelves. Many pleasant hours I anticipate in reading it. I feel now like saying what so many of your other subscribers have said about the many other books you have sent to them: "I cannot understand how you are able to send out such valuable reading matter, and receive so little money in return."

Russia in Extremity

RUMORS have been in circulation for some days that Russia is seeking peace with Japan, and has suggested that President Roosevelt act as arbitrator. These reports have been persistently denied, but they are still credited in well-informed quarters. It is very certain that the plight of Russia is of the most dolorous kind. The proposed loan has been rejected by French bankers, who are growing weary of the recurrent applications, having discovered that portions of new loans are being used to pay the interest on former advances. It is true that Russia has still immense resources on which she might draw, but they are undeveloped, and are difficult to realize. A loan was the readiest method of raising the necessary funds, and the refusal of the French bankers to take it up is a great disappointment to the Muscovite financiers.

On the field, Gen. Linevitch, who has succeeded Kouropatkin as commander-in-chief, is slowly and painfully retiring to Harbin. The difficulties of the march are extreme. The main body is still two hundred miles from its destination, and is being harassed on the way by small forces of Japanese. So deficient is the army of transportation facilities, and so hasty is the flight, that the sick who fall by the way are abandoned, and are cared for by the pursuing army of the Japanese. Already Russia has lost, in killed and prisoners, upwards of half a million men. The reports from the prisoners in Japan are decidedly creditable to the captors. They are well treated, are in comfortable quarters, and are well fed. It is believed that the Japanese are preparing to attack Vladivostok, Russia's chief Asiatic seaport, on which enormous sums have been spent to make it impregnable. That it will share the fate of Port Arthur is probable, if the Japanese concentrate their land and sea forces upon it. The fleet under the command of Admiral Rojestvensky is still far from the scene of hostilities. When last heard of, it was off the coast of Madagascar, where France, in defiance of its pledge of neutrality, was supplying it with provisions. The Japanese fleet is waiting its arrival in the East, and is prepared to deal with it before it can reach Vladivostok.

Internal disorders in Southern Russia continue. Bombs have been used in Warsaw, killing several policemen and seriously wounding Baron von Nolken, a high government officer. From the Crimea come reports of burning mansions, and in one instance a whole city narrowly escaped destruction. It was set on fire in five different places, and when the firemen strove to extinguish the flames, the peasants struggled with them and prevented their using the hose. A strong force of soldiers was sent to suppress the disorder. It is believed that the delay in sending reinforcements to the front is due to the fear that if the military were withdrawn from the provinces, a general rising of the people against the government would take place. Never was a royal house in so evil a case. Troubles from national enemies and troubles from discontented subjects and from creditors who will not find more money, have driven the rulers of Russia to their wits' end. Like the princes whom the ancient prophet warned, they are reaping the fruits of long years of misgovernment.

Because thou hast spoiled many nations, all the remnant of the people shall spoil thee; because of man's blood and for the violence of the land, of the city, and all that dwell therein (Hab. 2: 8).

A GROUP OF RUSSIAN PRISONERS OF WAR IN JAPAN

THE DISASTROUS RETREAT OF THE RUSSIANS FROM MOUKDEN

A Tireless Watcher

A man whose wife died ten years ago in Brooklyn, N. Y., has attracted the attention of the cemetery officials by his watch over her remains. He is more than seventy years old, and was tenderly attached to his wife. He purchased a vault for the reception of the body, and erected over it a costly memorial. Inside he placed a stove, and the furniture which formerly was in her room at home. He became a daily visitor, and remained all day. He told the curious people who questioned him that his wife was as dear to him in death as she had been in life, and that it was his duty to be near her all the time. He wanted to remain in the tomb by night as well as by day, but the cemetery superintendent refused the request, and he was finally induced to go home for the night. In accordance with his custom of years he went to the cemetery one day last week, and after sitting beside his wife's coffin for a time and talking to the body, he was seen by a gravedigger to be rearranging the things in the tomb. Early in the afternoon another gravedigger, on passing the tomb, peeped in and saw him lying on the floor. As the door leading to the tomb was ajar, the man stepped in and discovered that the old man was insensible. He had fallen in an apoplectic fit and was removed to his home. His life is despaired of. One cannot be sorry for such a death. It will be for him more perfect reunion than he ever experienced in the vault with the inanimate corpse.

Then shall I know even as I am known (I. Cor. 13: 12).

Shot Out of the Tunnel

An extraordinary accident occurred on March 27, in the tunnel that is being constructed between New York and Brooklyn. The workmen are boring under the bed of the East River, and have reached a point two hundred feet from the shore. An immense tube is used with big blades that bite into the mud. The river is kept out by compressed air, with a pressure of sixteen pounds to the square inch. Early in the morning eight men were at work at the post of danger, shoveling away the mud and dirt. Suddenly there was a sound of grinding and crunching, and looking upward it was seen that there was a leak. Bags of sand are kept at hand for such an emergency, but before they could be applied, seven of the men were jammed flat against the walls by the force of the compressed air, and the eighth was sent upward into the hole formed by the leak. For a minute he was held there, and then was driven through the mud above, then through the water of the river, thirty feet into the air. Falling back into the water he was still alive, and was able to swim until a boat came to his rescue. To the surprise of everyone who witnessed the accident, the man was little the worse for his experience, and was able to go home after the cuts on his head, inflicted by the stones and dirt through which he had been forced, had been sewn up. Thus the power that protected the men from the danger of the river, by its very strength proved a source of danger to this man when the leak occurred. It is so with all powerful agents, which may become potent for destruction as for preservation. Even the Gospel, which is a source of spiritual life, may prove a source of condemnation when it is not received in the right spirit.

To the one we are a savor of death unto death: and to the other the savor of life unto life (II. Cor. 2: 16).

Mistaken Identity

A remarkable scene took place at a funeral in Brooklyn, N. Y., recently. The colored cook of a well-known family became sick and was sent to a hospital. After some weeks, she became convalescent, and was removed to the convalescent quarters to complete her recovery. At the same time, another colored patient in the convalescent home, had a relapse, and was sent back to the hospital, where she was put in the bed recently occupied by the cook. She grew worse and died. It appears that the cards on the beds had not been changed when the occupants were transferred, so the cook's friends received notice that she was dead. The body was given to an undertaker, who removed it to the local Baptist Church for the funeral ceremony. The service was conducted and a sermon preached memorializing the character of the cook. The friends then passed by the casket for a parting look at the dead face. The mistake was then discovered. To their astonishment, it was not their friend but a stranger. The body was sent back to the hospital and the friends are looking forward to the return of their beloved one. It is rare, indeed, say the hospital authorities, that such a mistake is made. Happily for the Christian there is no possibility of its occurring in the eternal world.

The Lord knoweth them that are his (II. Timothy 2: 19).

The Resurrection of Miss Cynthia

By FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

"WHY didn't you?" asked one of the Puffer twins.

"Because my mother was afraid I'd tear my dress," replied Miss Cynthia, promptly and truthfully.

"I guess you did tear it," said the child doubtfully. "I heard something rip behind. Will somebody scold you?"

"No," said Miss Cynthia firmly. "I sha'n't even scold myself. It won't make any difference," she added in a low voice. "I'm glad I tore it."

She was, in fact, aware of a keen and peculiar satisfaction which held her warmly fast like the hands of the Puffer twins. She yielded to it without question. "It is only for a year," she told herself. She looked down into the upturned faces of the twins with a faint smile. "It's nice out-doors to-day, isn't it?"

"It's always nice out-doors," said one of the children seriously; "but it's nicer when it's pleasant. We're going after wild flowers to-morrow."

"I wish——" began Miss Cynthia. Then she stopped short; she remembered the belated house-cleaning.

"We're goin' to bring apples and bread an' butter, an' eat 'em in the woods," continued the little girl, sucking in her moist, red lips with anticipatory relish. "It's lots of fun to have picnics. We have 'em 'most every day in summer. Do you like picnics?"

"I never went to a picnic but once," said Miss Cynthia soberly, "and that was a long time ago." She hesitated, while a faint flush tinged her pale cheeks. "I—I've got some big red apples at my house," she said slowly, "and—and some red raspberry jam."

The children stared at her in wondering silence. "We like jam," sighed one; "an' every bit of mother's jam is eat up."

"If I could go after wild flowers with you, and—and——. Would you let me go with you?" Miss Cynthia's voice trembled with eagerness.

"Would you bring lots of jam on bread and two red apples apiece?"

"Yes, I would."

"An' a basket to dig roots? We're makin' a garden. Have you got a garden?"

"I've got some rose-bushes and peonies in my yard," said Miss Cynthia, doubtfully, "and I guess some daffodils."

The twins giggled and shot guilty glances at one another. "We didn't know you liked little girls," said one, presently. "Our mother said you didn't; she said we mustn't go in your yard. But we did. We picked two daffodils 'ithout askin'. Our mother said you wouldn't give a single one of your flowers away."

Miss Cynthia's lips trembled. "I do like little girls," she said, in a small, weak voice. "I never knew very many. I always had to stay in my own yard. But— ." Her head was lifted with a resolute air. "I'm not going to stay there any more."

The children looked interested. "Why not?" they demanded.

"Because I'm tired of it," said Miss Cynthia definitely. "You can have all my daffodils, if you want them."

"All right," said the Puffer twins, with cheerful unanimity. "We'll come an' dig 'em up to-morrow."

"I thought you were going to have a picnic?"

"We are."

"When?"

"In the mornin', maybe. Are you comin'?"

"If you'll let me," Miss Cynthia said joyfully. She suddenly decided that she would not clean house any more. "I don't want to clean house," she said aloud.

"We think it's fun," observed the twin who did most of the talking.

"Fun?" echoed Miss Cynthia weakly. "Fun—to clean house?"

"Uh-huh, heaps of fun! We like to rummage in old trunks an' boxes, an' pull things about."

Miss Cynthia remembered the plethoric boxes in her attic. "I've got a good many things," she said soberly. "But I never thought it was fun to pull them about. I—I never pulled them about."

"Why not?"

"I don't know," said Miss Cynthia doubtfully. "Perhaps I was afraid to."

"We aren't afraid," said the talkative twin, calmly. "We've got to go in now. I guess supper's ready, an we're hungry. We'll come to-morrow an' dig those daffodils."

"Don't forget," said Miss Cynthia. She felt suddenly old and very, very tired when the children had dropped her hands, and dashed with a cheerful whoop into the rather untidy Puffer door-yard. Her wet skirts dragged heavily about her tired ankles and her head ached. "I suppose," she thought drearily, "that I have taken cold. But—it won't make any difference."

There was a real comfort in the idea. She walked more briskly as she approached her own gate. "I don't care if I am wet," she told herself. "I shall get wet whenever I choose. I might as well."

The stooped figure of a woman clad in rusty black and bearing a large flat parcel, was fumbling with the latch. She looked up with a little apprehensive cough at Miss Cynthia's approach. "I'm reel glad you are home," she said eagerly. "I jest brought your dress over to try on."

"How do you do, Malvina?" said Miss Cynthia, opening the gate. "Come in, won't you?"

"I've tried reel hard to fix that dress-waist jest as you wanted it," quavered Miss Bennett, with an anxious smile. "An' I'm most sure the skirt 'll hang reel pretty now 'at the gethers is changed. I hope it will, anyhow. My! I ain't hardly slep' nights I've been so worried 'bout it."

Miss Cynthia regarded her strangely. "It doesn't make any difference about the dress," she said slowly. She was thinking confusedly that Malvina Bennett looked old and worn. She was painfully thin, too, and her breath came in little gasps. "Have you had supper?" she asked suddenly.

"Why, no, I ain't not yet." Miss Bennett told her, with a startled look. "As I says to mother, I wanted to fin' out if the waist is a good snug fit before I stitch up them under-arm seams agin. I'm bound I'll git that wrinkle out ef it kills me! You know you said you'd got to have the dress before Sunday. An' I thought mebbe ef I set up kind of late, I c'd——"

"Come in," said Miss Cynthia urgently.

A feeble light burned in the chill darkness of the front hall. Miss Cynthia shivered as she glanced about her. "Come in the sitting-room," she said quickly. "We'll—we'll have a fire and some hot supper."

"My land!" ejaculated the astonished seamstress under her breath.

"Abby!" called Miss Cynthia.

The door of the kitchen flew open, and a tall, spare-skirted figure appeared outlined against the gloom beyond. "Yer supper's ready," said the woman, recognizing her mistress with a deliberate sniff like that of a sagacious dog. "You c'n set right down an' eat 's soon 's yu'r min' to."

Miss Cynthia hesitated, then she straightened her little figure determinedly. "Malvina Bennett is going to have supper with me," she said. "Make some hot toast, Abby; plenty of it, and open a jar of preserves. And yes, we'll have the cold beef, too. I'm going to change my dress before tea, Abby, and I wish you would light the fire in the sitting-room and bring another lamp. I want it to be warm—and—and light."

"I do hope you ain't a-goin' to no extry trouble fer me," piped Miss Bennett timidly. "I'd reelly no idee of stayin' to supper; all I wanted was to git that dress-waist——"

Miss Cynthia smiled in a preoccupied sort of a way. "Sit down," she said gently, "There isn't so very much time, you know, and I've always wanted to have it warm, and—and light. It isn't pleasant like this, is it?"

The woman in the kitchen door turned a stupefied stare upon the dressmaker. "Toast!" she repeated, "an' another lamp—an'—an' a fire! You ain't calc'latin' to burn them nice round logs your ma kep' fer looks, be you? You ain't a-goin to burn 'em now?"

"Yes," said Miss Cynthia, with an obstinate tightening of her little mouth. "I'm going to burn them now—to-night."

When she came downstairs, trailing her best silk gown behind her, she found Malvina Bennett hovering over the timid flame, which seemed to hesitate about attacking the well-preserved logs. "The chimbley don't seem to draw reel good," ventured the dressmaker, casting sidelong glances of uneasy interest at her hostess. "These 'ere cert'nly do look to be awful nice, even sticks to burn."

"Well, I sh'd think es much;" chime in Abby Whiton, setting down tl tongs with a disapproving thum "An' I guess you disremembered th the meat-man don't call agin tell Sa 'day. We'll hev to save that cold bee fer to-morrow's dinner."

"We can have chicken to-morrow, Miss Cynthia said recklessly. "An way, I want the beef for suppe Bring some kindling, Abby, I want thi fire to burn bright. I want a bi warm fire."

The old chimney yielded its accu mulated damps with difficulty; but a last the flames roared cheerfully u its wide throat. Miss Cynthia sat be fore the purring logs with a satisfie little smile on her lips, her blue eye beaming with childish delight. "I looks," she said softly, "just as I al ways thought it would. After this— mean to have a fire whenever it i cold. Isn't it pleasant, Malvina?"

Malvina Bennett had enjoyed he supper thoroughly; she had been hun gry and tired, and the hot tea an toast and the generous slices of col meat had warmed her into a sem blance of cheerfulness. "I don't know as I ever see anythin' nicer," she sighed happily. "My! I never sh'd ha thought of sech a thing as stayin' her to supper!" She might have adde that no one else in the village of In nisfield would have thought of it either. The Old Breyfogle family hac never been famed for its hospitality.

"I like company," observed Miss Cynthia, after a little silence. "I al ways wanted to have company."

"Did you?" murmured Miss Bennett wonderingly. "Mebbe you won't like the way I fixed them pleats behind," she went on, with an uneasy glance at the flat paper parcel which lay unopened on a chair. "I guess I'd ought to git right to work, if I'm goin' to finish it by Sat'day night. The's an awful lot of fussy work on them bias folds, to git 'em to lay reel nice an' even."

"I don't want the dress Saturday," said Miss Cynthia dreamily. "I shan't need any more dresses."

Miss Bennett's worn lips quivered. "I wish't you'd jest take a look at it," she faltered. "I've took an awful sight of pains with the waist. I s'pose you've gone an' bought a ready-made dress in Boston, an' don't care no more fer my sewin'. I've always been 'fraid you would."

Miss Cynthia bit her lip. "I didn't mean that, Malvina," she said, after a pause. "I only meant that you needn't hurry. You—you look tired. I—I'm sorry I found so much fault with the dress — was it yesterday? It seems like a long time ago—a long time ago. I'll look at the dress, of course. Yes, that's beautiful. It's just as I wanted it. Sew it up as it is. And—and I'll pay you for it to-night."

Miss Cynthia sat by her fire for a full hour after her guest had left her. She wondered vaguely what she could have done or said to make Malvina Bennett so strangely happy and excited. Why, she had actually cried hen she said good-night. "I feel 's I'd never really knowed you all these ears," she had said. "I'm s' thankful come over. I was s' awful upset an' orried 'bout the dress I couldn't a'eely eat my victuals. 'N' now, ems 's 'o everythin' was changed."

The last words echoed in Miss Cynia's ears. "Why not?" she thought oud. "My life has all been of a iece, so far, and now—there's only—ie—year—left."

She went to bed and dreamed that ie was a little red-cheeked girl, wearg a pink dress with ruffles which ew wide in the warm wind, as she n down a long green hill, taking old of hands with the Puffer twins.

CHAPTER III.

THE cold, dun clouds, which had seemed to waver and lift a little the night before, had settled heavily upon Miss Cynia with the morning light. She was inking drearily of shrouds and cofns and funeral hymns, as she sipped r weak coffee from the cracked cup hich Abby Whiton had carefully ashed by itself for twenty years. he fire on the hearth had burned out, id the gray ashes stirred uneasily as ie spring wind whined in the chimey.

"Well, of all the impident young nes I ever see, them Puffer twins is ie beatenest!" Abby Whiton set down plate of pallid doughnuts before her istress with her customary definite ump. "I sent 'em a-flyin', though, ith a flea in their years! What you pose they was doin'?"

Miss Cynthia started to her feet, a ink flush staining the wan whiteness f her cheeks. "The Puffer twins, id you say?" she demanded excitedly. I had forgotten all about them. Where re they? I want to see them!"

"Home, I sh'd hope, by this time," id Abby tartly. "They was diggin' p your posies as cool es cowcumbers; ey sez——"

"I told them they might. Oh, Abby!" That estimable person stared in pen-mouthed astonishment at sight f her mistress running, bare-headed, rough the chilly April morning.

"Wait!" she was calling shrilly after ie two hurrying little figures. "Wait or me!"

The Puffer twins did not wait; they nly ran the faster, and defiantly langed the latch of their own gate in liss Cynthia's face as she came up, anting and breathless. "It was all mistake," she managed to say. "I orgot to tell Abby about the daffodils. She didn't know."

The twins stared at her in resentful ilence through the pickets of the gate.

"Won't you come back with me and et them?" implored Miss Cynthia, vith heartfelt distress. "Then—there s the picnic, you know."

The talkative twin nudged her sister nd giggled. "We told our mother 'bout he red apples an' the jam," she said t last. "'N' Ma, she said she guessed ve'd been listenin' with our elbows. She said you never gave anythin' way if you could help it."

Miss Cynthia looked from one to the ther of the two children, a painful ump rising in her throat. "Oh!" she said weakly, "I—I do want to give things away; I always wanted o. Won't you come and get the daffodils —Please come!"

The gate swung open, tentatively.

"Please, come," repeated Miss Cynthia humbly. She smiled wanly as she held out a blue little hand to each of the children. "I like to take hold of hands," she said.

Abby Whiton was standing at the side door, shading her astonished eyes with her hand when the three came into the yard. "Fer goodness sake!" she ejaculated, "what in under the sun's got int' her!"

She kept peering out of the window in the intervals of gathering the breakfast dishes together, while Miss Cynthia and the two children busied themselves in the weedy little border. They were undoubtedly digging up the daffodils. The next time she reconnoitred she beheld her mistress coming slowly toward the house, closely followed by the twins, who trampled recklessly upon her unguarded skirts.

"Come right in!" said Miss Cynthia hospitably.

Abby Whiton presented a war-like front on the threshold. "They ain't a-comin' in here one step till they've wiped their feet good!" she announced. "Fer the lan's sake! jest look at the mud! What you s'pose your ma 'd say to them feet on her carpets?"

Miss Cynthia did not seem to hear; she opened the door wide. "Come in - please!" she entreated. "I'll get the apples right away, and the jam."

Abby Whiton shut her thin lips together firmly while her mistress hastily opened a jar of the precious red-raspberry jam. "Cut some slices of bread, Abby, and bring up six of the biggest apples you can find," said Miss Cynthia hurriedly. "We're going on a picnic."

"On -- a — pic — nic!" repeated Abby shrilly. "Well, of all the redic'lous idees! I'd planned to begin housecleanin' to-day; I guess we've put it off a-ready 'bout as long es decent folks kin. The's all them trunks to go through in the attic, an --"

"I'm not going to clean house this spring," faltered Miss Cynthia, trembling guiltily under the severe scrutiny of the woman's eyes. "I—I'm tired of staying in the house all the while, and—and doing the same things. I've decided to have a picnic 'most every day after this. You can wash the windows, Abby, or do anything you like; but I——"

"Well, I want-to-know!" ejaculated Abby Whiton. She clattered down the cellar stairs in a whirlwind of righteous indignation, muttering ominously to herself.

Miss Cynthia, with a frightened, flushed face, crept into the sitting-room, whence issued the sound of excited giggles. The twins had climbed upon two chairs, and were staring at their distorted reflections in the old-fashioned mirror above the mantelpiece. "It makes us look awfully funny," explained one of the twins, clambering briskly down at Miss Cynthia's approach. "Did you ever look in it?"

"Yes, I have," said Miss Cynthia, with a depressed sigh; "but I never thought it was funny."

"Well, it is funny," said the child positively. "It makes us laugh. Come on, Ed; I guess we're goin' now."

Miss Cynthia looked weakly astonished. "I thought her name was——'

"It's Edwina," giggled the little girl, "and mine's Harriet. But our pa calls us Ed and Harry most all the time. He says we're most exactly like boys, so we might as well have boy's names. What's your name 'sides Miss Cynthia?"

Miss Cynthia blushed delicately. "Once — a long time ago, somebody called me June," she said, as if talking to herself. "He—said I looked like—just like a lovely day in June, when the roses were in blossom. He called me that—June Day. It was so long ago that I had forgotten it, till—yesterday. Then I remembered about it."

The children were regarding her attentively. They said nothing.

Miss Cynthia fidgeted uneasily under the gaze of their candid brown eyes. "I don't suppose," she murmured, "that I look like that—now."

"We think you'd look some better if you were fatter," said Harriet doubtfully, "and if you had on a pink dress, an' if your hair was curled."

"Here's yer apples," snapped Abby Whiton, thrusting her hatchet face in at the open door. "But of all the fool doin's I ever heerd of —. You'll ketch yer death o' cold fer one thing. This ain't no time of year fer eatin' victuals out-doors."

Miss Cynthia was packing the sandwiches and apples into a little splint basket. "Of course I shall wear my rubbers, Abby," she said with dignity. "Besides, I—I don't care if I do take cold. I shall take cold if I wish."

"I'M NOT GOING TO CLEAN HOUSE THIS SPRING," FALTERED MISS CYNTHIA

It was surprisingly pleasant in the April woods. The pale sunshine flickered cheerfully through the leafless branches and lay in warm patches on the wet brown leaves and sodden mosses. The Puffer twins screamed with delight at sight of the first downy-stemmed hepaticas, clustered bluely at the foot of a giant beech. "Don't let us pick 'em!" cried Harriet, hurling herself bodily upon her eager sister. "Let's let her have 'em; we'll find some more. Look! there's white ones over there! An' I'm most sure I c'n smell arbutus!"

Miss Cynthia was on her knees beside the nodding blue flowers. "Oh!" she murmured. She touched the dainty things with her pallid little fingers, a soft rapture of happiness thrilling her through and through. She did not pick them.

The children, returning with blossom-crowded hands, stood quite still and regarded her curiously. "She's just a-lookin' at 'em," whispered Harriet. "She hasn't picked one."

"I guess she thinks they're most too pretty to pick," said Edwina, with a little sigh of understanding.

"More likely she's thinkin' 'bout the apples," said Harriet with a practical air. "She looks pretty hungry, anyway, an' I'm most starved."

Nobody in either the Breyfogle or the Day families, as far as Miss Cynthia knew, had ever been hungry for their food. She was entirely familiar with certain unpleasant sensations at the pit of her stomach, to which it had been her habit to refer as "my faint spells." That these "faint spells" frequently prefaced one of Abby Whiton's pallid meals, served in the curtained gloom of the Breyfogle dining-room, Miss Cynthia was well aware; but she had never mistaken them for common, vulgar appetite. She observed the rapturous looks of anticipation on the round, freckled faces of the children, with astonished interest.

"Hm ——" sighed the twins in soulful concert, as their sharp, white teeth sank juicily into the shining sides of two red apples.

"Do they taste good?" asked Miss Cynthia incredulously.

"Uh-huh," assented Harriet, with wordless satisfaction. "Why don't you eat yours?"

Miss Cynthia bit timidly into one of the rosy spheres. "I neglected to bring my fruit-knife," she murmured apologetically, then quite forgot how "unlady-like" it was to bite an apple, in her amazed enjoyment of its novelty.

"We'd better save the rest till we're hungry again," observed Harriet frugally. "It's an awful long time till this afternoon, an' we'll be most starved time we get up on Byer's Hill. There's heaps of wintergreens up there, an' they'll be chuck full of berries. Come on; let's hurry!"

It was a long tramp through briar-set pastures and scrubby woodlands; there were high rail-fences to climb over, and shallow brooks to cross on slippery round stones. Miss Cynthia's unaccustomed little feet ached cruelly; her breath came in hurried gasps; but she doggedly followed the indefatigable twins, who skipped over the ground like a pair of red squirrels.

Edwina's quick brown eyes were the first to observe her distress. "Why, you're getting real tired, aren't you?" she asked kindly.

Miss Cynthia's lips quivered; her eyes filled with a sudden rush of childish tears. "I—I'm afraid I can't—go much further," she faltered. "My side aches so, and——"

"It's your clo's," pronounced Harriet briefly. "You can't run an' climb fences when you're a lady. Sometimes we play lady on rainy afternoons; but we're aren't ever goin' to be truly ladies. 'Tisn't any fun. You c'n sit down here an' rest, an' we'll go up on the hill an' get the wintergreens; after that we'll go home. We'll bring you some of every single thing we find—cross our hearts, we will!"

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

WINDOWS IN THE WALL

WRITING this lesson on Inauguration Day, with regiments of soldiers marching under our window, in anticipation of its use on Easter Sunday, God's own coronation day for Christ and Christians, we feel the contrast between human governments and the divine kingdom of Christ. As the regiments of organized force march by, led on by generals on war horses, we recall the greater might of Him who rode the ass of peaceful royalty, followed by the shouting people, whose praises and palms were his coronation service. It is a direct consequence of the spread of Christ's kingdom, that Russia is almost the only kingdom left in the civilized world, in which one man's whim is the supreme law, and even there, autocracy is manifestly doomed. The spiritual kingdom that began in love for Christ, and for all men as his brothers is eventuating in republics, where the law comes from within the people, not from above or without, though still a few soldiers are needed as a larger police for the unbrotherly survivals of savagery that remain.

When a foreigner coming to the United States, asked to see "the ruler of America," he was pointed to the passing crowd. We choose a man of ourselves to be under the constitution and laws; our chief public servant for four years only. That is a century plant blossom of Christ's teaching, that abiding government must begin, not in conquest, but in conviction, and must be fostered, not by force but by love. Between the triumphal entry of Him before whom prophets cried, "Behold thy King cometh unto thee meek," and the recent peaceful inauguration of an elected President, we see like mighty battalions, the nineteen Christian centuries marching ever forward with Jesus Christ at their head.

From this twentieth-century view of the triumphal entry in its broader meanings for nations, let us turn to the more personal views of it at the time: 1. The People's view. 2. The Pharisee's view. 3. Christ's own view.

1. The People's View of Christ's Kingship. Zechariah (9:9) had prophesied: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion! Behold thy King cometh unto thee meek, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt, the foal of an ass." The Jews therefore expected the Messiah would so enter Jerusalem. The ass did not represent to them low estate in the Messiah, for even to-day, judges and princes ride on the fine blooded asses of the Orient, that represent peace, in contrast to the horse, which symbolizes war. Jesus knew both the prophecy and the expectation, and it was therefore a proclamation, by deeds that speak louder than words, that he was the long-expected Messiah, when he sent for the colt and rode into Jerusalem amid popular Hosannas. The surest of all sure things in this uncertain world, is that Christ was too good to deceive, and too great to be deceived. Nothing is more rational than to believe absolutely whatever was said by "the Purest among the mighty, and the Mightiest among the pure." Here then is the first great certainty presented by this lesson, that Jesus was the promised Messiah, which is the same word in Hebrew as Christ in Greek, both meaning the anointed; that is, the King. But the selfish hearts of the Jews, that at a later hour of Palm Sunday, mistook for thunder the words God spoke from heaven to Christ, about glorifying his name; mistook the prophecies of a Prince of Peace, who was to save men from themselves, for promises of a temporal conqueror who would destroy their enemies. They anticipated he would make the old Jerusalem not a new Jerusalem, but a Rome, dominating the world in the selfish interest of the Jews, by external force. His mission they thought was conquest, rather than conversion. The very last conquest to which men in all ages are willing to be assisted is this conquest of themselves. Always the people would rather "do" something as a means of salvation, than be what Christ would help them to be.

2. The Pharisees' View of Christ's Kingship. While the people's fundamental error was in expecting for Christ only an external kingship of temporal power, the Pharisees, seemingly very different, made the kindred error of making religion itself a matter of externals, talliths, phylacteries and the like, with no regard to the heart. But their contempt for the common people made it inconceivable that the Messiah should come from any set but their own, and so they even ventured on Palm Sunday, when the hosannas were at their loudest, to say to Christ himself, "Rebuke thy disciples." Referring to a prophecy they well knew, he answered, "If these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out."

Here is a pertinent story of a Pharisee of our own time: A genteel young lady, member of one of New York's "old families," and teacher in a Sunday School there, went to the superintendent with sadness in her face and air, saying: "In my study of these lessons, I find that Saint Paul was the only Apostle who came of a good family." Desperately striking out for some grain of consolation, the superintendent replied: "Yes; but you remember that our Saviour himself was the Son of a carpenter." "I know," said the still disconsolate maiden, "but then he belonged to the royal family of David."

The Pharisees would not have a Gallilean to rule over them, whatever his superiority of soul. Even in America, and in the Church of the Carpenter of Nazareth, we need to condemn the wicked pride, the false emphasis on externals, that puts social standing above character. The clear warning of this lesson, from the errors of the people, who within a week abandoned their King to death because he did not support his kingly claims with outward pomp and power, and of the Pharisees who rejected him because he condemned their religion of externals, is that the Kingdom of Christ must begin in the full surrender of individual souls to the law and lordship of Christ. It will grow from individual convictions into social institutions, but it must begin in the soul—not in forcible subjection, but in willing submission.

Christ's Kingship as Christ saw it. Napoleon, almost alone in exile, recalling the speedy collapse of the great empire he had so rapidly conquered by force, said: "Jesus alone founded his empire upon love, and to this day millions would die for him." Christ had nothing that day with which to conquer the world but the mig of right and love. Matthew Henry reminds us: He h begun his earthly life in his great poverty in a borrow cradle; and later sailed in a borrowed boat; and now rode on a borrowed ass; and was soon to hold the Pa over in a borrowed room; and later would be buried in borrowed tomb. How his life emphasizes that nothi really counts but character! "All is lost," said the ban rupt father, almost falling into his home. "I am n lost," said his brave wife. "Nor have we lost our chil nor have you lost your character and abilities. What a the dollars lost to these best things that remain?" H who has not love for God and man is poor, whatever el he has; and he who has this diamond of love cannot l poor, whatever else he lacks.

Christ showed no undue exultation at the honors p on him, for he knew that "crown him," and "cruci him" would swifty follow each other, with resurrectic and ascension beyond; and he knew that office is n merely or chiefly honor, but responsibility and opport nity. Even heaven should not be thought of as a pla of honor and idleness, but of higher service. It is to of Thomas a Kempis that once, during his student day his preceptor asked the class: "What passage of Scri ture conveys the sweetest description of heaven?" On answered: "There shall be no more sorrow there." A other said: "There shall be no more death." Another "They shall see his face." But Thomas, who was th youngest of all, said: "And his servants shall serve him. Brighter than heaven itself, Jesus saw the time when th "five hundred" disciples of his earthly life should be th five hundred millions of professing Christians of ou twentieth century. "For the joy that was set befor him he endured the cross, despising the shame."

Lest Christ's Kingship should seem to us only a son or sentiment, let us recall that it fullest present embodiment is in th "Lord's Day," the sign, the ensig of his Lordship, in that some in al lands for one day each week pro claim his kingship by putting asid their tools and toil, and devotin the day to rest and worship. Doe some boy wish he could have bee of those who crowned Christ witl waving palms? He can do a brave service by standing for the Lord o the Lord's Day when it costs t do it.

Long ago a country boy wen to New York City, with nothing for a start but character and th printer's trade. He found work in one of the largest offices in th city. One Saturday afternoon h was given a long "take" of copy, which he could not possibly "set" without working on Sunday. He gave it a glance and then said, "I will work on this till twelve o'clock to-night, and finish what I can; but I cannot work to-morrow." "Then you'll lose your place," said the foreman. The boy then took the copy to his employer, told him that he had been taught to reverence the Sabbath, and that he would resign his situation rather than violate his conscience. His employer could not but respect such a spirit, and he never again asked him to work on Sunday. That boy was John Harper, the founder of the publishing house of Harper Brothers. The way to make Christ king is not by singing alone, but especially by making the laws of Christ the laws of our own lives, and then uniting with others to make them, one by one, the laws of the land.

But when we have a life to back up our hosannas, let us sing out our joys to win others and to honor Christ. In so doing we shall proclaim Christ so far as our song is heard. Years ago, when the Mediterranean was infested by pirates, a Scotchman named MacDonald was taken captive and long held as a slave in the Barbary States. He was often asked and even commanded to give up his faith and become a Mohammedan, but would not, and was consequently treated with increasing cruelty, and daily loaded with heavy burdens. But he would cheer himself at night by singing from his Scotch version of the Psalms. One night as he sang he heard footsteps about his tent, and thought his persecutors had come for some new torture, but he sang on. Suddenly masked men entered, threw a shawl over his head, covered his mouth, and hurried him into a boat on the adjacent shore. He expected to be thrown overboard, but instead, found himself ere long on a British ship, whose sailors had heard his music coming from the shore:

> All people that on earth do dwell,
> Sing to the Lord with cheerful voice,
> Him serve with mirth, his praise forth tell,
> Bow ye before him and rejoice.

"MANY SPREAD THEIR GARMENTS UPON THE WAY, AND OTHERS BRANCHES OF THE TREES

*International Sunday School Lesson for April 23, The Entry of Jesus into Jerusalem. John 12: 12-26. Golden Text: "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Matt. 21: 9. HOME READINGS, giving consecutive life of Christ from all four Gospels: Sunday, April 23 John 16: 16-24. Monday John 16: 25-33. Tuesday John 17: 1-12. Wednesday—John 17: 13-26. Thursday—Matt. 26: 36-46. Friday—Matt. 21: 47-56. Saturday—Psalm 2.

This story of "Palm Sunday" is placed on Easter Sunday, no doubt, in the idea that inasmuch as we are many lessons from the resurrection in regular course of study, the whole of "Holy Week" will be briefly surveyed by preachers and teachers, beginning with the story of this lesson, with Easter briefly anticipated as God's own coronation by resurrection. The kingship of Christ over death and life is the message of both days.

Children's Reading

THE question, What shall our children read? is hardly exceeded in importance by any other that comes under parental notice. Books are so vital, hey exert so strong and enduring an influence on char-cter, that they should be treated precisely as we treat iving personalities. No judicious mother suffers her hildren to associate with vulgar, rude, or profane boys nd girls. She tries with the greatest care to keep her ome free from the taint of vile companionship, and she loes not forget the old word of scripture, "evil commu-ications corrupt good manners."

Unfortunately, the same thoughtful supervision is not xercised by all mothers over the printed page. A hild is seen deeply absorbed in a book or ewspaper, and the mother goes about her ork, her mind at rest because Johnny s out of mischief. Incalculable harm has een done to growing boys by publications pparently respectable, which have filled heir minds with impure thoughts, or sent hem forth on foolish and romantic ad-entures, in which they have imitated the are-devil heroes of the stories they have ead. As well may one give a child slow oison deliberately, as put into his hand a ad book. It may be too much to ask very mother to read every book that omes into her house before her children ouch it, but it is not too much to request hat a certain censorship be imperative.

The books in the Sunday School library re safe as a rule, and so are those which re drawn from the ordinary public library. n both these instances, committees com-osed of men and women of good literary aste, and some experience in criticism, elect the books, with a view to choosing hose which give pleasure and impart in-truction.

Children are very fond of nature books, nd one does not go far wrong in choos-ng such reading for them. Mr. Kipling's amous jungle books are favorites with all nspoiled children. Fur and Feather Tales, by Hamblen Sears, should be on he juvenile book-shelf. Any book by Mrs. Olive Thorn Miller is perfectly adapt-d to a child's reading. Effie Bignall in Mr. Chupes and Miss Jenny and a Quintette of Grey Coats, makes a bid for the suffrages of children. Intelligent young people rom the age of ten up to fifteen, read nd enjoy books which one would imagine uite beyond them. The children at home nderstand a great deal more than we uppose about the world around them, nd are often interested in descriptive iterature which was written for their elders. They are learning at every pore, and the ordinary talk of the household educates hem.

In fiction it may almost be taken for granted that the little girl will read with avidity books written for her brother, while the boy, as a rule, scorns any book which seems to him intended for beings who wear petticoats. The books of Kirk Monroe appeal to both boys and girls. The long list of Elsie Books, though far too sentimental, and too obviously adorned with morals to be altogether commended, have stood the test of time remarkably well, and do give a certain amount of pleasure without doing other good. Much more wholesome and natural are the books in the series about the Little Peppers, and nobody has as yet surpassed for children, Miss Alcott's Little Women, Eight Cousins, and Rose in Bloom. The Wide, Wide World, Queechy, Say and Seal and other books of Elizabeth and Anna Warner, though now out of fashion, are still good reading for children. Into the hands of a boy or girl whom I love, I would put Froissart's Chronicles, Tennyson's Idylls of the King, Stevenson's Child Garden of Verse and his Treasure Island, Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, and Dickens' David Copperfield. If we want children to care for good literature we must give them real books to read. I question very much whether a book-loving child would receive any harm from being allowed to browse at will in a good library, well filled with standard authors. The trouble is that we so often deprave children's taste, by giving them purely juvenile books, written down to suit them. Strong bodies cannot be built on a diet of weak broth and exclusive sweets, nor can strong minds rise and grow if fed on a mawkish diet.

Encourage both girls and boys to read aloud. Should there be in your mind a doubt as to the propriety of a certain book, the best thing to do is to have the child read it in the presence of the family. A bad book cannot stand that test. Each child should have some books that belong to his or her own little library. Birthdays, and school competitions, and Christmas gifts will add to the stock, and the father, instead of candy, should sometimes surprise the little ones by a new book.

Speaking of a home library, it should not be left out of the year's budget. Books may be borrowed from friends or a lending library, it is true, but that is an ill-furnished house in which good authors are not represented. When a fine set of books is purchased, or a coveted volume brought home, there should be joy as over an event that causes gladness. Only the short-sighted and the uncultured neglect provision for the unseen part, while adding to the store of comforts for the physical nature.

IN PICTURESQUE CAIRO

Though Cairo presents every characteristic of a foreign land, and though the mystery and picturesqueness of Egypt meet and surround one there, it is yet cosmopolitan in these days of travel, and one runs an even chance of meeting and hobnobbing with a neighbor from home, when first he strolls through the alien streets. Amid the jargon of foreign tongues, the English-speaking man will often hear his own.

About the Mother-in-law

A READER has asked that a word be said in behalf of the mother-in-law. The relation of the son's wife to his mother, or of the daughter's husband to her's, has been the theme of endless argument, and of paragraphs almost as numerous as the sands by the sea.

By common consent, the mother-in-law is regarded in print, as the object of suspicion or aversion, her visits are supposed to be unwelcome, and her constant presence in a household is not infrequently declared to be inimical to peace. Undoubtedly, there are mothers-in-law who do not get on comfortably with their son's wives, and there are men who are always sorry when informed that a visit is impending from the one dearest in the world to a wife, next to her husband, namely her mother. The very closeness and intimacy of the tie sometimes causes jealousy between women who have so much in common that they ought to be very dear friends. Sometimes the newcomer in the family deliberately sets herself to wean her husband away from his own people. The latter find that they seldom see him, and that when they do, he no longer belongs to them; but has passed out of their reach, and is wholly absorbed in his own home, forgetful of the one that sent him forth. This is happily not universal. It is not true that a son forgets his mother because he is married, and it would be an unjust aspersion on many wives, to say that they tried to sow dissension between their husbands and their relations.

We ought to remember that the fine art of living together in peace under one roof is never easily acquired. Many a time kindred closely allied by blood, are extremely uncongenial, and irritate one another in multiform ways, without in the least intending to do so. If we cannot get along comfortably with our own people, how are we to manage with those who but the other day were perfect strangers?

Rufus marries Evelyn. She has been brought up under one regime, and he under another. The two mothers are very different persons. Perhaps they are of different social traditions, with different standards, and with little in common. It will not be plain sailing for the mother of Rufus or the mother of Evelyn just at first, but love finds out a way. Where there is true love for any one, there will be tolerance, conciliation, and consideration in little things. When the children come, and the mother-in-law becomes the adorable grandmother, idolizing the second generation, and spoiling it as she did not spoil her own brood, then the want of harmony ceases. Few grandmothers are anything except beloved in the families of their children, and with the sceptre of grand-maternity the reproach of the mother-in-law passes away.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—INQUIRER. I repeat what I have said before, that a perfect complexion depends, first, on perfect health of the body, and next, on entire cleanliness. If the functions of the body are carried on regularly, the skin will look fine and clear. A daily bath from head to foot, and the washing of the face every night with tepid water and fine toilet soap, will soon do away with blackheads.

—PERPLEXED. If a young lady is visiting her brother at a college or university at a period when a great deal of social life is allowed, a chaperone is regarded as being absolutely necessary.

—GENEVIEVE. If you cannot sleep well with your bed as it is, why not change its position? Some persons claim that the head of the bed should be toward the north; with others it is a matter of indifference. A girl should not oblige a young man to go to the expense of a carriage in taking her to any social affair. In some cases, if the young man's income is small, he might be very much embarrassed.

—A. E. I. There is undoubtedly a good deal of rudeness in street cars, especially in New York City, where people are always in a tremendous hurry. Men are frequently so absorbed in their newspapers that they do not see women who are standing. Sometimes a man gives a woman a seat, which she relinquishes to [illegible] and then leaves the car; someone else [illegible] the vacant place, and the original owner of the seat has to stand for miles. This is one reason why men dislike giving up their seats. I notice that elderly women and women carrying babies never [illegible] seats given them very soon.

THE RUSSIAN PEASANT AND THE WAR

"THE LAST MEAL AT THE LITTLE CABIN TABLE"

nate seasons, of laying by any savings. When the last day comes, upon which the peasant soldier must bid his dear ones farewell, the household is overcome with sadness. The poor mother, her eyes red with weeping, sits silent and thoughtful, looking wistfully at her husband so soon to leave her, perhaps to find a grave on some bleak Manchurian battlefield, as so many others have done before him during this terrible war. Between them sit the children, bowed down with a sorrow beyond their years. That last evening around the home hearth, the last meal at the little cabin table, will linger with them as a picture never to be forgotten. Then the father, according to the time-honored custom among the Orthodox Russians, must receive the blessing of the parish priest before he sets out on his journey to the war. This is a memorable occasion.

"THE BLESSING, AND THE SOBBING OF THE WOMEN"

TO the humble workers in the agricultural districts of Russia, the war with Japan has brought nothing but sorrow and suffering. Their lot, a hard one at the best of times, has been made still harder by the cruel conscription, which has torn thousands of fathers from their wives and little children and sent them to the front, to fight the Japanese.

In the three illustrations on this page, the Russian artist has pathetically depicted scenes in the conscription which are familiar in every Russian farming community to-day. Ordered by the military authorities to service for the Czar, the peasant father is saddened by the dread that he may never again see his wife and little ones. The poor wife is stunned by the blow, which takes from her and the children their only protector and provider, and dooms them, in all probability, to a life of hardship and want, for the Russian peasant has little chance, even in fortu-

"HE TAKES HIS GRIPSACK FROM THE HANDS OF HIS SON"

But the conscript, poor and ignorant though h may be, is a man, with all of a man's courag and bravery. He holds it to be his sacred dut to give his service, and if need be, his life, t Russia. So, when the moment of parting comes he kisses his wife and his children, takes hi gripsack from the hands of his eldest son, an with a smile on his bronzed and bearded face sets out to join the company of conscripts about to march from the village. A week, or it may be only a few days later, he is "entrained" on the railroad, and the journey to the front has begun.

Over half a million men, a large proportion of them peasants, have already been lost by Russia through death on the battlefield, disease or disability, since the war began. What a vast array of saddened homes, of widowed mothers and orphaned children these figures represent! Even if victory had perched upon the eagles of Russia, it would have been won at the cost of countless heartbreaks and ruined homes.

A BLIND BABIES' KINDERGARTEN

IN a cheerful room, where everything showed the dainty taste and womanly heart of the occupant, there stood a white crib where two little babes slumbered peacefully. Two small heads peeped above the soft covering, and two pairs of rose-leaf hands were snuggled warm and pink under dimpled chins. The babies looked not unlike any well-cared-for youngsters of that age—three months—pink and white as to color, and more or less "pudgy" as to feature.

As a faint cry from one awakens the other, we see that they are decidedly unlike any other babies we ever saw, for as they open their eyes, it is apparent that they are totally sightless, hopelessly blind. In the darkness into which they are born, they must remain as long as they live. Poor little mites, what can the future have for them?

Hark! From an adjoining room come sounds of childish voices, telling in unmistakable accents that a frolic of no mean proportions is under way. We leave the babies, busily engaged with their bottles of warm milk, and take a peek into the other room, the nursery, where half a dozen children are playing. They are all busy piling toys upon a little wagon. As the floor is bare, and the toys of the indestructible kind, there is considerable noise made which, combined with shrill voices, make the racket all healthy children delight in. A couch on one side of the room holds all sorts of things in which children from two to five years old find happiness; dolls, wooden and tin toys. Strange to say, there were no more broken ones than children with sight would have, for, although you would hardly believe it, these little ones are also blind. This is the "Sunshine Home for Blind Babies," and the sweet-faced woman standing among them, with one of the infants from the white crib in her arms, is Mrs. Cynthia M. Tregear, in whose kind heart was born the thought which resulted in the founding of this home and kindergarten.

In her work as professional nurse, Mrs. Tregear came in contact with a number of these unfortunate little ones, and there seemed to be no place for them. They were the children of the poor. All institutions, homes and schools for the blind do not take into account the blind babies, or very young blind children. They are not admitted into the Kindergarten for the Blind until they have reached the age of eight years. "In their own homes," said Mrs. Tregear, "these little ones are of necessity neglected. Neither their bodies nor their minds receive that special care and attention which their helpless condition calls for. Their bodies remain weak and undeveloped, for want of exercise.

Just here a collision occurred between two mites coming from opposite corners of the room, but each took the bumps good naturedly, and were up the next moment. The incident served, however, to give point to Mrs. Tregear's remark. "Without their physical sight," she continued, "their mental eye, also, is almost completely deprived of every ray of light, by which their faculties could grow. Remaining thus in utter darkness, in every sense of the word, until eight years of age, with their bodies undeveloped, they become almost incapacitated for instruction, and their condition is pitiable." It is to help these babies to begin their education, almost from birth, that Mrs. Tregear is laboring, with the co-operation of the International Sunshine Society, of which the Home is a branch.

SOME OF THE BLIND CHARGES AND THEIR GUARDIAN

Contributions of money, infants' clothing, toys, cribs, chairs, carriages, etc., have come from all parts of the country. In consequence, the home is a cheerful, cosy place.

Miss Beryl H. Clark, who was educated at the New York Blind Asylum, is secretary of the directors of the Home, and also kindergarten teacher, and a most valuable and valued helper. The irony of fate might be seen in the very name of the institution—"Sunshine Home for Blind Babies"—did we not feel that the sunshine of love which began, and is carrying on the work, illuminates the never-ending night into which these little ones are born.

MARY SARGENT HOPKINS.

Both Sides of the $100,000 Controversy

BOSTON, MASS.—The report of the Sub-Committee of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions concerning the $100,000 gift now in dispute, says, in substance, that, in accepting the gift, the committee followed the universal custom of the church in the past. The Committee also holds that "acceptance of a gift involves no expression of opinion on the part of the committee as to the character of the givers, and to intercept a gift made to others in order to express an opinion seems unwarrantable.

"For almost a century the Board has received gifts from every quarter in America, Christian and non-Christian alike. In receiving gifts from these varied sources, the Board has in no degree and in no way passed judgment on the business, religion, character, or life of the donors.

"In this policy we have followed the universal custom of the past, for the church in all ages has received upon its altars the gifts of all who were moved to lay them thereon. The same principle has been followed, not only by philanthropic and educational institutions but by other missionary bodies.

"Your committee sees no reason why we should have departed from the custom of the Board, and made our committee practically a tribunal to decide whether gifts are to be received.

"It would be manifestly unjust and unthinkable," the report adds, "to reject gifts without thorough scrutiny, and it is equally clear that no committee could possibly undertake the task of such a scrutiny. It seems to us that it would have been an assumption and usurpation, if we had tried to stop the money of any man who wished to give it for missionary work.

"Gifts made to the church can be accepted only upon the assumption that they are debts paid to God, and to humanity, and involve nothing whatever in the way of favors. To assume that obligation is designed or contemplated, is to accuse the giver of seeking to further his own interests, and the church of being a respector of persons."

COLUMBUS, OHIO.—Rev. Dr. Washington Gladden, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Columbus, and Moderator of the General Council of Congregational Churches, in a recent sermon discussed the gift of $100,000 made to the American Board. He strongly opposed acceptance, and in the course of his remarks, he said: "The people of the United States have a tremendous battle on their hands with the corporate greed which has intrenched itself in this stronghold, and has learned to use the railways for the oppression and spoliation of the people. And now, on the eve of this battle, they are asked to accept a great gift of money from a man, who more completely than any other, represents the system they have been summoned to fight.

"We do not want this money. To accept it will be to earn the contempt of millions of honest men; to reject it will strengthen our churches in the affection and respect of millions who are inclined to doubt whether the churches love God more than Mammon. Our missions will be richer and stronger without it than with it, and we shall lose nothing by our loyalty to the things unseen and eternal.

"There is a loud call in the Christian churches for a higher style of idealism. We want Christian leaders who have more faith in ideals, and who are less in bondage to expediency and the low motives of materialism. In this commercial age, with the whole population going mad in its quest of money, the church is in great danger of putting an emphasis on its need of money which will conceal from its own vision the secret of its power. Money seems to us a thing so indispensable in our Christian work, that we are fain to stifle any convictions of truth or righteousness which may stand in the way of obtaining it. 'We can do so much good with the money!' we say.

"It is just here that we need to call into our counsel the Christian gentleman. From him it is needful to accept the suggestion that we cannot honorably take favors from one whom we ought to denounce as a public enemy."

DEDICATION OF THE BROADWAY TABERNACLE

By Rev. F. Stanley Ven Eps

NOT less remarkable than the structure, of which a picture and description appeared in this journal on Feb. 15, has been the dedication of the edifice which has extended through the month of March.

With a somewhat elaborate programme the service of Sunday, March 5, was the consecration of the church to the worship of God, many clergymen taking part: Dr. Wm. Hayes Ward; Rev. Geo. A. Gordon, of Boston; Rev. S. H. Cox, of Bethany Church; Dr. E. P. Ingersoll; Dr. W. A. Rice; Rev. H. A. Bridgeman; Dr. A. C. McGiffert; Dr. C. R. Seymour; Dr. J. M. Whiton, and Dr. A. J. Lyman, of Brooklyn, who delivered the sermon.

The service of dedication, with the congregation standing, was beautifully impressive, the pastor and the people responding in the service. Following this was the Hymn of Dedication, and then the Prayer of Dedication, the pastor and the people joining in the utterance of the prayer, after which Dr. G. F. Herrick pronounced the benediction.

That afternoon at 4 o'clock, a congregational Fellowship Meeting was held, Rev. S. H. Cox speaking of "Bethany, the Daughter Church;" Rev. Frederick Lynch, of "The Churches of Manhattan;" Rev. W. H. Kephart, of "The Churches in the Bronx;" Dr. N. McG. Waters, of "The Churches in Brooklyn;" and Rev. W. D. Street, of "The Suburban Churches."

That evening, Dr. H. P. Dewey spoke on "The City Church and Young Men;" Dr. S. P. Cadman, on "The Mission of a Metropolitan Church."

Thus the first day, which is usually the only day of dedication, was filled; but this church had more in mind, a broader scope of dedication, and if this month's services are prophetic of the work which the church is to do in the coming years, it will continue, as in the past, a maker of history.

More than thirty sermons and addresses have been delivered during this dedicatory period, as we may call it, by men of world-wide fame as preachers and educators; and amid all there has been exhibited a spirit of deep consecration and an earnest enthusiasm and zeal for the great cause of Christ and humanity.

Our All in All

WE are often weak and weary,
We are often faint and frail,
The eyes are blurred with weeping,
And the lips are wan and pale;
But Christ is our strength and gladness,
His love sustains the soul;
In the day of our utmost dearth and loss,
His love can make us whole.

We can never perish, holding
Fast to his tender hand;
His care will lead us safely
Through all the desert land;
The blessed love of Jesus,
And the look in his gentle face,
Are cordial to the fainting,
Are full of light and grace.

O Love divine, be ours,
In the night-time and the day,
Forever with us, Jesus,
Remain our hope and stay;
Thine be the love that keeps us,
Ours be the love that clings,
Till we rest beneath thy banner,
O gracious King of kings.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

A Christian Epic

"THE Heavenly Voice," is the title of a volume of poetry by Margaret Ayres Carr. This is, in reality, a Christian Epic. The writer has accomplished her task with rare skill, and her verse has a sweetness and power that might almost be called inspiration. The Heavenly Voice is a three-fold poem, comprising the Dual Life of Christ, the Portraitures and the Sonnets. The first deals with the divine and human nature of Jesus, opening with the Creation, and embracing among other themes, the Controversy, the Mystery, the Incarnation, the Presentation, the Question and the Mission. The Portraitures (sixteen in number) portray Christ in angelic form in his various appearances. The themes of the Sonnets are the miracles, the parables and some of the words of Christ. The book closes with one hundred Sonnets to Christ, expressive of the ardent love and adoration of an awakened soul.

The Dual Life has great melody of rhythm, unity of thought, and much comprehension of the divine character. In these lines the poet voices the "unwritten prayers" of the Saviour:

My Father, let the word of truth prevail,
In hearts and lives of people so benight:
Its teachings in the purer, nobler life;
Its spirit in the higher sense of right;
Its power in the ability to keep:
So all this flock, without a shepherd long,
May guided be to shores of thy great peace.

And presses upon the heart and thought, in the continuous daily sacrifice of self, his love for man:

Thou weariest not, O Saviour of the soul!
Of mercy's kindly work: 'tis thy delight
To re-create in health, the body, soul,
Believing ones thou turnest ne'er away,
Albeit not of Israel's chosen race.

Again we have this vivid portrayal.

Lo! one draws near to rivet every eye,
From somewhat in his port of majesty!
Of slender build, as one full young in years,
Of quiet mien, commanding in his air,
Expressing all of sweetness in his face,
Withal so marked by more than earthly look,
John's answering spirit answers, "It is he!
'Tis he! the Christ, the Saviour of the world!"

From the Sonnets, we take the following extracts, the first being the Miracle Sonnet:

Day's beauteous orb behind a veiling mist,
Laments in sympathy's sweet robe for morn,
Weeping, distrait, of shimmering glory shorn,
Sorrow has come to Bethany home, I wist;
So loud the weep and wail of mourners, list!
Sickness, death and the grave four days have worn,
Before Christ comes to weep with friends forlorn;
To show his glory forth in love's new tryst.
"Lazarus, come forth!" Obeying voiceful power
He rose, recalled to life and love. Though he Delayeth long to test our faith, in hour
Of need he'll greater bless humanity.
His voice uplifts the veiling mists that lower,
So we his glory's brightness newly see.

This is from the Parable Sonnet:

In stilly watches of the quiet night,
The charms of nature lapt in lulling fold,
The astral lamps aglow with twinkling light,
A cry is heard: "The bridegroom comes, behold!"
Ten sleeping virgins wake from drowsy sleep;
Five trim, refill their lamps to enter in,
While foolish five seek oil they failed to keep,
The door is shut with only wise within,
"Open to us," they cry; "we wait without."
Alas! he heeds them not; they've come too late,
The Spirit's oil supply need ne'er run out:
'Tis meant to last through life's long fitful wait.
If sought in prayer, if kept with watchful care,
We'll enter in, the Bridegroom's joy to share.

In the one hundred Sonnets to Christ, every flower is described and made to pay tribute to the graces and beauty of the Saviour's life and character. The following is an example:

O flower! thou too are like my pierced flower!
Thou, too, exud'st thy life in every stem,
Hast thou some healing virtue in thy hem?
If so, thou know'st somewhat his reach of power,

If so, thou hast a blessing for the hour.
Thy petals' glow is not thy diadem.
Though crusted o'er with many a pearly gem;
Thy life's free flow is thy most precious dower;

The only dower that e'er avails for me,
That changes all my life to thy one hue;
That gives the blessing of the life to be.
O pierced flower! Thy life's full flow, anew
Prevails. Thy whitely life I know, I see,
Its hue shall be my life's sole color too.

The Bowery's Tribute to Fanny Crosby

THE Bowery Mission Hall was crowded; every seat occupied, and the space about the entrance filled with interested men. The sun shone brightly, smiling on Fanny Crosby day. Superintendent Hallimond conducted the meeting. After prayer by Mr. Long, Mr. Fred. Card read the Scripture lesson. The superintendent then announced that the service would consist mainly of songs of Miss Crosby's composition, sung by different soloists, while many familiar choruses would be sung by the audience. The voices blended in strains that would have touched the hardest heart and the most unmusical soul. Mr. Fitzgerald, formerly a member of the Bowery Mission Quartette, sang with fine effect one of Miss Crosby's hymns. He was followed by Mr. James Hunt, whose sympathetic voice lent an added charm to the music. Mr. Bryant, a more recent Mission convert, sang another well-known hymn, in a strong sonorous voice. Hymns were sung by a number of other members of the Mission, Mrs. Hallimond lending the charm of her sweet, powerful voice, to the music of one of the favorite productions of the blind, old Christian poetess, whose birthday they were celebrating. Several of those who sang, had a personal acquaintance with Fanny Crosby, and were asked by Superintendent Hallimond to tell how they had met her. This proved a very interesting feature of the meeting. All united in declaring that Miss Crosby, notwithstanding her affliction, was invariably so happy and so bright, that her every look, word and tone, were a reproach to those, who, with their faculties undimmed, go through life moping and complaining.

The touching and softening effects of music, wedded to earnest words, were never more fully shown than on this occasion, when the men of the Bowery, who gathered merely to listen, lingered to pray. No finer tribute was ever paid to consecrated genius, than that which was thus spontaneously offered by the men of the Bowery to the aged Christian, whose sweet songs have made her name a household word in countless American homes, and through whose unconscious influence, thousands of the class to which the men of the Bowery belong, have been drawn to Christ. At the anniversary meeting, there were many who earnestly asked for Divine help in leading better lives, the change to date from "Fanny Crosby Day" at the Bowery Mission.

A Deserving Institution

The Calvary Nursery and Primary School, of Greensboro, N. C., now in its seventh year, is an institution for poor colored children. The school opened with ten children, and there are now two hundred pupils enrolled. The number could be much larger were accommodation sufficient. Rev. and Mrs. S. S. Sevier, the former as president and the latter as principal of the school, have proven very efficient managers and teachers. They are now anxious to erect a suitable building, which will accommodate three or four hundred children, and also to secure the services of two additional teachers. Any aid rendered will be welcomed.

Dr. Keigwin in New York

TO the intense gratification of the West End Presbyterian Church in New York, Dr. Alfred Edwin Keigwin has decided to accept the invitation unanimously tendered him, and has begun his ministry. His former charge, the Park Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J., felt the utmost reluctance to lose him, but recognized the importance of the larger sphere, which, as they know, he is so well qualified to fill. They have had for four years the benefit of his inspiring ministry, and none know better than they, how helpful will be the work he is likely to do in the metropolis.

Dr. Keigwin is not yet forty years of age. He is the son of a Presbyterian minister, now pastor-emeritus of a church at Wilmington, Del. He graduated from Princeton and settled at Millville, N. J., whence he went to Newark, N. J. There he entered with untiring energy into pastoral work. The membership rapidly increased and a mortgage of $30,000, which had crippled the church, was liquidated. His sermons drew crowds of young men to the services, who hung entranced on his burning utterances. In the Sunday School and the young people's societies, especially in the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip, his influence was stimulating and inspiring. No one could listen to him without the conviction that he has an intense belief in the message he delivers and is sure that it is the one thing needed for the redemption of the world. Such a man will be welcome in the city, and there is good reason for hoping that his preaching, as well as his pastoral influence, will be blessed to the salvation of many souls.

HELPED BY THE PRISON-GATE MISSION

ONE of the objects of the Prison-Gate Mission, in addition to leading men to Christ—which is the only sure and permanent method of reformation—is to find for them some kind of employment. Few persons want to employ a discharged prisoner; people are afraid to trust him, and fewer still are ready to take him to their home, and treat him as a brother overtaken in a fault, and one to be restored in the spirit of meekness. At this juncture, the Prison-Gate Mission steps in and finds work for the released man, and commits him to the care of some Christian employer, who promises to direct his future, as a matter of personal cross-bearing for Christ's sake. The Mission has sent out many men to fill various positions.

Lately, a man came into the office of the Prison-Gate Mission. He was in hard straits; he had seen better days, and had led a wild, dissipated life. Three years ago his father died; and soon afterward his mother. Instead of these trials softening his heart, he took refuge in strong drink. Then his wife and children died, one after the other, after which he became reckless enough to commit a crime that brought him to prison. When he was released, Chaplain Munro met him and invited him to the Mission at 192 Elm Street, where he pleaded with him, and told him of the Christ who can save to the uttermost. Sometime later, when a good Christian employer wrote to the Prison-Gate Mission for a man to help him on his farm, the chaplain sent this man. He had become truly repentant, and was earnest in his appeals to be helped to a better life. How the experiment resulted is shown in the letter from the farmer:

DEAR CHAPLAIN MUNRO:—I have been waiting to see how my man was going to turn out before writing you. I want to tell you he is getting along nicely. He attends church regularly, as well as the meetings of the League. We try to throw around him every religious influence. After he came here, I secured him clothes for week day and Sunday. He now looks like a different man. He has become a member of our Sunday School and attends the Bible Class. At family worship, he kneels with the family. We hope he will become a member of the Church. Pray for me that the Lord may bless me in all my efforts to help my ex-prisoner friend. I like him very much. J.W.S.

Contributions of money to carry on the work of the Prison-Gate Mission may be sent to Andrew A. Knowles, treasurer, 33 Wall Street, New York City. Cast-off clothing, shoes, etc., may be sent to 192 Elm Street, New York City.

Green's Nursery Catalogue, for 1905, comes in very attractive form. The illustrations are all in black and white, and set forth Green's Nurseries in an inviting and convincing manner. A cluster of Red Cross currants, taken from a photograph, shows the beauty and productiveness of this fine fruit. The nurseries have 245 acres devoted to the cultivation of trees plants and vines. No agents employed, the catalogue being the only salesman. Green's Nursery Co., Rochester, N. Y.

Have you seen the New Guide to Rose Culture, which the rose growers, The Dingee & Conard Co., are sending out. It is an attractive booklet with the above title. A specialty is the new rose the "Baby Rambler." It is dwarf and ever-blooming, and if grown in a pot indoors, will flower every day in the year. This rose is a French production, the result of a cross between the Crimson Rambler and Glorie des Polyanthus. When fully grown its height is but 20 inches. A great variety of other magnificent specimens of this queen of flowers, will be found described in this catalogue. Dingee & Conard Co., West Grove, Pa.

Miss Ella V. Baines, the woman florist, says that it is ten years since she started as the pioneer woman florist, that from a very small beginning her customers are now counted by thousands. Her Bon Ton collections of Carnations include sixteen varieties, a specialty is the New Ponderosa Lemon. A photograph shows a potted plant eighteen months' old, 12 inches high, bearing two monster lemons weighing three to four pounds each. This plant was grown in an ordinary living room. Miss Ella V. Baines, The Woman Florist. Springfield, O.

Vicks' Garden and Floral Guide greets us with a cover gay with vari-colored Gladioli. Eighty-eight pages of interesting reading and valuable information for flower, fruit and vegetable growers follow, and fine illustrations show what can be raised in that line. The name of "Vick" carries weight and conviction. James Vicks' Sons, Rochester, N. Y.

Wm. Henry Maule, offers among other delightful things, the "Earliest of All" Tomato, painted from nature, showing exact size of fruit and foliage, looks "good enough to eat." This is only one of the good features shown in Maule's Seed Book. Wm. Henry Maule, Philadelphia, Pa.

David C. Frost sends out his annual descriptive catalogue of high-grade seeds for garden, lawn and farm. David C. Frost, Seedsman, Lexington, Ky.

Attractive catalogues have also been received from James J. H. Gregory & Sons, Marblehead, Mass.; F. B. Mills, Seedsman, Rose Hill, N. Y.; Quaker Hill Nurseries, Newark, N. Y.; The S. Y. A Church with a Hotel Annex greatly facilitated future missionary effort. But his monumental work was his Burmese Bible, to which he devoted no less than seven years in the matter of revision alone.

The erection of the memorial church by the missionary's son, Dr. Edward Judson, was of course partly due to the expression of filial affection; but it is also a just tribute to the most famous of the little band that has done so much to illuminate the darkened Orient with the light of Christian Gospel.

Dr. Edward Judson has been frequently urged by Dr. Harper to become the permanent head of the Department of Homiletics in the Chicago University; but his heart is in the work of the church on Washington Square, and it was with difficulty that he could be persuaded to give six months of his time this year. In his absence his pulpit is being supplied by Rev. John L. Jackson, of the Hyde Park Church in Chicago, Mr. Judson acting for him while teaching at the University.

The Empty Tomb

By MRS. M. BAXTER

DEATH robbed of his prey! Who has conquered death? Only One in the mighty universe; He of whom it is written, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, even the devil; and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. 2: 14, 15). The empty tomb! Every town and village has its cemetery and its graveyard; how quickly they fill! The population of the cemeteries keeps pace with the constant increase of population. How it seems as though death had the victory, and as though he who had the power of death were not destroyed! But to them that know Christ as the Resurrection and the Life, death is but a passage into a fuller life, and again and again have we seen in the experience of God's true children who were occupied, absorbed with Christ, the fulfilment of those words of Christ, "Verily, Verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my word, he shall never see death" (John 8:51).

Our Lord, by the majestic power of the same word which called light and life into being, had emptied the tomb of Lazarus. The word, "Lazarus, come forth," had recalled the absent spirit to its former habitation, and Lazarus lived, leaving the tomb empty. It was a pledge and prophecy of his own resurrection which he had on several occasions foretold to the disciples for their consolation, but which they had not understood.

The Scripture, as shown to the Apostle Paul, declared Jesus to be "the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4), and he showed to the Jews how the resurrection of Christ was the fulfilment of that prophecy in the second psalm. "We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers"—probably that promise of resurrection in Ezek. 37:11-14, mentioned in Acts 26:6, 23—"God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is written in the Second Psalm, "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee" Acts 13: 32-33). Thus when his tomb was empty, the Scripture was fulfilled. But the women, who had not understood, were "much perplexed thereabout." And God sent them two messengers from heaven in shining garments. They needed a revelation from heaven to solve the mystery. And these two messengers asked, as the women with fear bowed down their faces to the earth, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" and said, "He is not here, but is risen."

Yes, they remembered when it was recalled to them, but at the time these words had made no impression, and thus they were unprepared for the cross, the tomb, the resurrection of our Lord. They returned from the sepulchre, and told all these things unto the eleven and all the rest. But they, too, were unprepared; their words seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. The Word had not laid hold of and transformed them, and they had judged it by their own small experience and by their finite wisdom. They had yet to learn that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned" (I. Cor. 2: 14). But Peter and John also went to the sepulchre, and saw for themselves that the tomb was empty; and more: that the winding-sheet, which had been wrapped around the body of Christ, had been undisturbed. The body had slipped out of it. No human hand could have unwound the body and restored the winding-sheet to the form of the body which it had contained. He must have arisen by his own mighty power, and John "saw and believed."

As the tree in its spring beauty of flower, or as the fruit-laden tree in autumn, compared with the little seed, which, buried in the earth, contained the germ of its future being—so will be the resurrection body in which we shall rise. It will be the result of our life here. All that we have taken in of His life will appear in our body of glory; but nothing that has been of self.

Regular and rational riding in fresh air and sunshine is exhilarating exercise.

RESURRECTION POWER*

THE promise of immortality that is given to us through Christ, includes much more than the prolongation of life. It would be a doubtful boon to be endowed with the power of going on living. It is easy to conceive that such an existence as that of the fictitious wandering Jew, might be an intolerable weariness. The sins, and sorrows, and pains, and disappointments of life weigh so heavily, that many aged people welcome death as a relief. Few have lived so happily that if the offer was made them of living through precisely the same experiences a second time, it would be accepted. If we could begin life again, with the advantage of our present experience, then it would be worth doing. We see at maturity the mistakes we made; we see that much that seemed to us promising and desirable in our youth, was a fraud and a deception. We would avoid this and that blunder, and would do many things that in the past we neglected to do. It would be a different life, purified and enriched by past experience. It is this which we hope to attain through Christ.

Resurrection life is a development of character. It is the product of suffering and regret. It is disillusion. It is a redeemed life. As one who has been rescued from death by the exertion of a friend who lost his life in the effort, all the future is sanctified by the experience. A life that it cost so much to preserve, ought not to be wasted in frivolity. The friend who gave his life to preserve ours, would have the right to expect that we should make good use of the gift. If previously we had lived for self gratification and pleasure, we ought in future "to walk in newness of life." The value of life would be enhanced. It would not be our own, but would belong to him to whom we owe it. To fritter it away, to waste it in any form, would be base ingratitude toward the man who died to save it. His death ought to be a sanctifying influence that should never lose its power.

It is more even than this, that Christ has done for us. He has given us the power to lead the new life. Knowing well our weakness, our incapacity, our innate propensity to evil, He has provided a remedy for it. Whosoever gives himself over to Him, is enabled to begin a new life. The past is obliterated and out of all the sin and failure it comprised, comes a new beginning with new powers. The old life came to its end at the Cross. When the meaning of the Cross was perceived, we died to all the old life with its joys and pleasures and frivolities, and as Christ emerged from the tomb, so do we arise to lead the resurrection life. "The power of his resurrection" is upon us henceforth, and should be with us to the end of our lives.

It is in the perpetuity of this power that the value of immortality consists. The qualities it produces go on forever, so that death is a mere incident and the life beyond the grave is a continuation of the life here, under better conditions. How this hope transforms life! The hard struggle to do right, to be good, ceases to be a hopeless drudgery. It becomes a preparation for better things. There is a time coming, in which this feeble life will blossom forth and reach out into the sunshine. The future life beyond the grave is no longer a mere reward, a life of dull felicity. It becomes a developing life, in which the seed planted here, growing amid so much difficulty, often almost crushed, rises into vigorous growth. Thus the power of his resurrection becomes a present help. Every step we take in the divine life, every attainment we make, every trial patiently endured, every service, humble though it be, that we try to perform, is a gain that will bear fruit in the future. We are being fitted for glorious development. We know not yet what we shall be, but the promise is sure, that we shall be like him, when we see him as he is. The disciples knew Him after his resurrection when He broke the bread and when He gave them his benediction of peace. Like Him! What better promise could we have? It is an inspiration and an encouragement to fortitude and service that never fails.

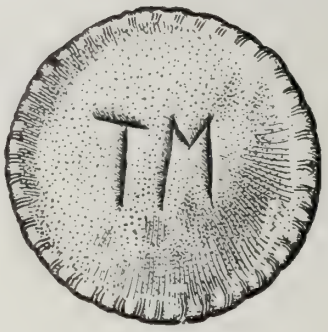
Bakers' Marks



There is a story of an old lady who made up a batch of mince and apple pies.

Wishing to be able to distinguish one kind from the other she marked the mince pies T M for "tis mince" and the apple pies T M for "taint mince."

The baker's marks on the ordinary run of bakery products are of little more value for purposes of identification than the marks on the old lady's pies.

But HERE is a trade mark that really identifies—that enables you to distinguish the world's best baking—the Biscuit, Crackers, and Wafers made by the NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY. This trade mark appearing in red and white on each end of a package guarantees the contents to be of highest quality—pure, clean and fresh. To learn something of what this trade mark means try a package of either of the products mentioned below.

Lemon Snaps

An appetizing nibble with the flavor of the refreshing lemon. A revelation in modern baking.

Butter Thin Biscuit

Unique little biscuit, in much favor with those who want "something different."

Graham Crackers

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

When I Was A Girl

AN EASTER SYMPOSIUM BY AMERICA'S FAMOUS WOMEN

"WHEN I was a girl." All the notable women who here tell the story suggested by those words, more or less in detail, declare the subject a most fascinating one. The letters came in answer to a number of questions sent them by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in regard to the difference between the girls of to-day and those of yesterday, in environment, education and opportunities. It is reasonably certain that all who read these "human documents" will find therein double interest; first, that inseparable from the story of women who have made a name for themselves by doing something worth while; second, the personal interest involved in the perusal of the early lives of others, in which the reader recognizes elements typical of her own individual girlhood.

'Girls Were Taught by Sensible Mothers to be Self-Reliant"

My girlhood was spent in a village in Oregon. In the West, I think that girls enjoyed greater freedom in the companionship of boys than they do now. Chaperones were practically unknown in the early eighties. Girls were taught by good and sensible mothers to be self-reliant, to know right from wrong, and to take care of themselves.

As to whether girls have better opportunities to enjoy themselves, depends upon one's conception of enjoyment. The fortunate ones who were born with a genuine appreciation of nature, had better opportunities to be happy when I was a girl than they have now. They were not taught athletic exercises, but they turned to outdoor life. The sermon that made the greatest impression upon me, was one held under the firs and cotton-woods on the green banks of the Clackamas River, with the fragrance of spring drifting over us. The sermon was not notable; but, in my girlish imagination, I seemed to be back in the sweet, simple days, when Christ walked barefoot on the earth, and gave us his pure and simple creed.

I did not deliberately choose my "public career," I drifted into writing because it was the only work I ever cared to do.

ELLA HIGGINSON,
Author of "Mariella of Out West," etc.

"Patrick Henry Was the Great Name Among Men that Inspired Me."

My girlhood was a very happy one, for I was the only child of a very indulgent mother. I was also my father's boy. We hunted and fished together. I was taught to love church and Sunday School, but was not compelled to go. Living in the country, the village Sunday School was one of the blessings, not only for its uplifting influence but for its social intercourse. It was an event—one to look forward to and to welcome.

The greatest historical event to me was the fall of Fort Donelson, which was witnessed by my mother as a girl, and with whose story she delighted to fire my young blood. The most memorable moment in my "public career" was the time I saw my first copy of my first book. I ran in my mother's room and fell down on the couch and burst into tears. It seemed to me that I had given to the world something of myself that I could never take back again. My vocation was chosen. It was inclination. I wrote a novel before I ever read one. Patrick Henry was the great name among men, which most inspired me, and among women, Joan d'Arc.

"The 'Ten Blessings' Were Particularly Impressed Upon my mind"

In my girlhood the chaperon was unknown, except in young ladies' seminaries, and there was in home life opportunity for the companionship of young men at reasonable hours; but young girls were not allowed to correspond promiscuously with young men and exchange photographs. The principal amusements allowed in schools were literary entertainments, musicales, walks and drives in the open air. Athletic exercises were limited to gymnastics. We had not then entered upon the pleasures of tennis and golf. The ten blessings were particularly impressed on my mind in Bible study.

I came naturally into the practice of the law, to assist my husband, who was a practicing lawyer, and at one time an invalid. A peculiar incident of my girlhood was that while still in my teens, I was invited by a conservative lawyer to become a student in his office to study law, which I declined without a moment's hesitation, for the reason that such a thing as a woman lawyer was entirely unknown to me, and I disliked notoriety.

"I Owe Much to my Beloved Father," Says John Strange Winter.

John Strange Winter, the novelist, famous as the author of Bootle's Baby, etc., in an authorized interview with our representative in London, said: "I was the ugliest girl in all England. I had a huge mouth and a button nose. I was then Etta Palmer, daughter of the Rev. Henry Vaughan Palmer, rector of St. Margaret's, York, England. The great regret of my young girlhood was that I had no sisters, and had to seek my companions out[illegible] our home. I went first to a local school in York, and later studied under my father. I attempted to study Latin, but Euclid was my Waterloo. Of course I went to church to listen to my father's sermons, but I never had to sit up very straight in church like other girls, because we always sat in the back seat.

lifetime, I owe to that same beloved father. He taught me to take an interest in those who were worse off than I. I used to seek out the poor factory girls and talk to them of their lives, and try to teach them the good lessons my father taught me.

"I wrote my first book in 1874, when I was eighteen, and I have since written over one hundred books."

"Forty Years Ago, a Chaperon Was Not a Necessity"

I think that girls of forty years ago lived simpler lives, and had more real freedom than the girls of to-day. In Puritan households, however, possibly a more strict regard was paid to the Sabbath, to church services, Sunday Schools and the like. But a chaperon was not a necessity. Girls in the country had plenty of amusements, sleighing, coasting, riding—all kinds of what they called fun. For myself, I loved books; and I read so many, that I could hardly tell which one most influenced me. I loved best the poets. I think the first novel I read was Jane Eyre, but life changes so, as time goes on, that one sees events of the past "as through a glass darkly."

LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON,
Poet and Author.

"I Delighted to Learn of the Good Deeds of Great Men and Women."

In my girlhood I never had the companionship of boys, as in the school I attended boys and girls had separate schoolrooms. I never went to dancing-school or learned to skate. My father was very strict, and would never allow me to appear in tableaux. Therefore I may say that the girls of to-day certainly have more freedom than the girls of my girlhood, if I speak of my own personal recollections.

Church attendance was never obligatory, but it always gave me delight to attend church, and I was as proud of my certificate of confirmation as one would be of a diploma from college.

Sunday School influence was a very important part in the bringing up of the girls of the family. I spent some of the happiest hours of my life there, and always delighted in the teachings of the Bible. I never read novels. Most of my time was spent on the history of music and art, and I delighted to learn of the good deeds of great men and women.

My friendship was always firm. The friends of my girlhood are my staunch friends to-day. When I was twelve years old I won a thousand dollar prize for playing the piano. When I was eight years old my brother was going away on a sailing-ship for his health. The captain said: "We sail at daybreak," and I had promised my brother I would be at the dock to see him off. It was somewhat dark about four o'clock in the morning, and I had never been out very far alone. I was determined to keep my word. At daybreak I went to the pier, and to my great surprise found that the gates of the piers were locked, and they were very high. It never occurred to me that the piers could be locked at night. I do not remember that I ever climbed a fence in my life, but I made up my mind that I would see my brother before the ship left. I got over the large pier gates all right, in spite of the careful watchman, and kissed my brother good-by, greatly to the astonishment of the people aboard the vessel.

The greatest pleasure of my career was when I was Valedictorian of the first Women's Law Class in the world. When I was in the midst of my address there was a terrible explosion of calcium powder, and there would have been a panic in Carnegie Lyceum if I had not said: "It is only a flash-light!" These six words probably were the means of saving some lives, as a great many had already fainted, and a number rushed for the street. I received more applause for these words than I ever received before, or ever will, in a public place.

I overheard a remark my father once made, that women had not enough brains to compose music, and from that time on I was determined to find out if that was exactly true. I was very successful in my studies, and formed the National Federation of Women's Musical Clubs and other societies. My father took great pains to encourage me in all my studies, and was the first man who came nearest to my heart. The second man to influence me was my husband.

MRS. THEODORE SUTRO, Mus. Doc., Author, Artist, Society Leader.

"The Men Who Most Influenced Me Were My Father and His Friends"

I have one fault to find with my girlhood life. I craved strict, exacting teachers, who would train me thoroughly, and I never had but one, and that for a few months only. The great men who most influenced me were my father and hisfriends.

I didn't choose my career. It chose me. My husband wanted me to study medicine and to take an active part in good work. So when I saw something to be done and no one to do it, I tried to fill the gap.

I have received many letters from strangers. I remember one in particular that touched me deeply. A mother wrote asking if I could find the nurse who had cared for her boy when he died in the army hospital at Ponce, Porto Rico, as she might learn some of the details, of which she was quite ignorant. I could hardly finish reading the letter, for the tears filled my eyes; but unfortunately I could not help her. I asked all the nurses who were in Porto Rico at the time, but they said the men were dying so fast that no nurse had time to learn even the names of the patients.

"Nothing Could Make Up for the Memory of the Bible Chapters Father Read"

My education, such as it is, comes largely from browsing through all sorts and conditions of books. My only playmate was black Martha, who, if old things had not become new, would have grown up to be my maid. We neither of us knew the word athletics—the fact, however, was mighty familiar, as we were both tremendously accomplished tomboys.

Church-going was optional at our house, although Sunday was strictly observed, and family prayer a part of daily life. Nothing else could make up to me for the memory of the chapters my dear father read to us. I read the Bible for myself whenever I chose, likewise Shakespeare, Don Quixote, the Spectator, Josephus, Plutarch, Macaulay and Gibbon. I so love the Bible throughout that it is hard to select a specially favorite passage. "Though I walk through the valley and the shadow of death I fear no evil, for thou will be with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," perhaps comes as near as any.

As to novels, there was no talk of "permitting" me to read them, or any other books in the house; so I read Cooper, and the Children of the Abbey (my mother's old copy), laughing heartily over high-piled sentimentality; Scott straig through, novels and poems; Dickens, A thony Trollope, Charles Reade, Will Collins in snatches, Gilmore Simms, Ma ion Harland, Augusta Evans, the earli Howells and Bret Harte books.

I did not choose a career; if there w any choosing, the career chose me. Ev since I could talk I have been making stories. I used to tell them over to a poc helpless kitten in the safe seclusion of t trundle bed. The kitten died, but t story-habit persisted. By and by I g bold enough to dictate to my sister, myself not having reache d even the sta of pot-hooks. And then the impulse sle for years and years, to wake again, a set me spoiling good white paper, and t amiability of editors. If I really could ha chosen my career, I would have been eith a blacksmith or a chicken-fancier. historic events, Thermopylæ and the Alam both taught me how men and gentleme could die.

In my girlhood, conditions were very much what they are to-day. The years do not bring much change in the relations of young people in each generation. There is an irresistible attraction which draws boys and girls together, but careful mothers safeguard their associations within proper restrictions. Then, as to-day, the girls danced, played games, went in swimming, rode on horseback, skated and bowled. They did not ride a bicycle, for they were unknown.

Frequent Changes of the Home Influenced Her Girlhood

The great incidents of my childhood were the annual changes of residence occasioned by my father's ministerial calling. Also the frequent anti-slavery revivals, in which my father was a powerful leader.

I married early, and have always found in husband and children my greatest joy and deepest inspiration.

I was swept into the temperance movement in the early seventies. Then I was led to study law and political science; and I now find myself lawyer, reformer and politician.

THREE EASTERS IN A YEAR

BY A. H. FORD

I HAVE spent the same Easter Sunday in three different countries thousands of miles apart from each other. The first of my Easters found me in the Sandwich Islands, where our vessel touched for a day at Honolulu, on her way to Japan. Here the natives and half-breeds swarmed aboard, with their leis, or ropes of owers, until our boat was soon covered with floral fferings. Ashore, everyone was in pure white, or white edecked with gay ropes of color. The churches were idden behind banks of flowers, and everywhere the air as heavy with the perfume of opening blossoms. It was gala, careless day, to these half indolent descendants f the old warriors that once peopled the island, and hen our ship was eady to depart, ward evening, it emed as though she ad been re-rigged om stem to stern, ith ropes of gaudy owers. As we ipped out into the arbor, the thouands on the dock who alled "Aloha" good luck), appeared as a monster ilderness of waving se-bushes, rather an human beings isappearing in the st gathering gloom f a tropical dusk.

Twelve days later e reached Japan. t was Easter there; e great Shinto festival of the cherry lossoms was about take place, celerating the resurrecion of nature from he white shrouded omb of winter. very year in early pril comes the Japnese Easter, and all apan goes out 'rikisha riding. Then, the cherry trees are in full bloom, o household being too poor to have a few of these rees growing in the front yard. They line the oadway for miles; the gentle spring breezes shake the oughs, and a continual pink snow-storm is kept up ll day long. The tinted petals fall until the roadway is inch deep in perfumed snow; then gorgeously obed Japanese children come to roll in the fallen petals, nd sport in the clouds of minute pink leaves that are whirled about. The laughter of the children resounds rom everywhere; it is their Easter snow-storm, and they re happy. Three days of rejoicing over the arrival of pring; all the temples are thrown wide open to the our winds once more, and all work ceases throughout he land.

The first day of the Easter festivities belongs to the hildren. Little girls, robed in white, form long processions, while boys in white and blue, or robed like he rainbow, prepare to ride aloft on the chariot temples that are drawn through the streets by processions of girls. Ropes, hundreds of feet long, are attached to the temple wagons, which the little girls slowly drag through the main streets and along avenues carpeted with fallen cherry blossoms, while perched in every nook and corner of the temple, and even on the roof itself, the boys beat drums and sing songs of joy. When the great moving pagoda halts, the brightest boys, known for their mimic powers, come out upon a little platform before the temple, some dressed as girls, others behind false head-pieces representing priests, and they give religious dramas to the delight of thousands of grown people, who follow and surround the wagon temples.

The favorite playgrounds during the great festivals are the hill tops, where magnificent parks are laid out around the Shinto temples that crown every favored slope in Japan. The little Jap kneels for a moment before the great open temple, claps his hands, gazes up at the single sacred banner high up among the rafters, offers his little prayer and is off to join his parents and comrades at play, for around the temples take place all the national games. During the kite festival, for instance, which is a religious festival in Japan, the hills are crowded with kite flyers. Light bamboo structures are erected, the flat roofs covered with matting to keep out the sun and rain, so that the elders may eat their meals in peace and comfort while the youngsters without romp about, either sailing kites, or watching others at play. Thirty thousand kites of all sizes, shapes and color, flying from a hilltop less than a square mile in area—like so many winged griffins and graceful birds, darting hither and thither among the clouds in a confused mass—is a sight not soon forgotten. When the little Jap gets tired of flying his kite, a fond father is always at hand to hold the line and show what he could do when he was a boy on that same hilltop, where his father used to hold the line when he grew tired.

From Japan I sailed for Port Arthur on the ill-fated Kornrloff, now a riddled wreck. A Russian priest was among our passengers: he was on his way to open the little Greek Church at Port Arthur with appropriate Easter services. In fact, all was even then bustle aboard, preparing for the Russian Easter which, being a movable feast governed by the moon, often falls a month later in Russia than with us, as there is a difference of twelve days between the Greek and Roman calendars.

We were scheduled to arrive at Port Arthur on Easter Eve. But for Father Ivan, however, we might never have arrived anywhere. In our for'ard hold, we carried a hundred convicts from southern Russia, bound for the mines at Saghalien. These poor wretches plotted among themselves to wreck the ship among the many islands of the Korean archipelago, murder the passengers and crew, and take their chance of escape in the small boats. It was Father Ivan who picked up a scrap of paper on the fore-deck one afternoon, as it fell from the hand of a convict taking his daily airing. It was intended for a fellow-prisoner who could read, and it gave instructions that revealed a plot. There was a lively time battening down hatches and preparing for emergencies, but owing to Father Ivan's promptness the plans of the convicts were frustrated, and we arrived on Easter Eve at Port Arthur safe and sound.

The Russian engineers, however, had been too busy on the fortifications to spare enough of the 50,000 coolies under them to complete the work to be done on the little church; and so it was that the first Christian Easter in the quaint old Chinese town, was celebrated aboard the Russian warships in the harbor (some of which now lie at the bottom of the bay). Everywhere —at the expense of the Czar—tables groaned with Easter delicacies, while wine and vodka flowed like water. For three days all work was suspended, and everyone feasted and drank. Soldiers lay helpless in the gutters of the town, and sailors on the decks of their ships. It was the Russian idea of celebrating Easter. Those who were sober enough, early Easter morning saluted each other with the "holy kiss" thrice bestowed; but Port Arthur during the Easter season presented anything but an edifying sight. The cherry blossoms of the Japanese this spring will seem a welcome change, and it may be taken as a foregone conclusion that no drunken orgies will be permitted to disgrace Japan during either the native or Christian Easter festivities at Port Arthur hereafter.

For a month I had followed and kept up with Easter in lands separated by vast distances from each other, and had taken part in Easter festivals of three nations, that mirrored to me the characteristics of the people more clearly than could any other religious or civic celebrations.

AN EASTER SUNDAY SERMON BY REV. CHAS. M. SHELDON*

CHRIST OUR LIFE

THE life that flows through our existence is but a sluggish ditch compared with the full, deep, powerful current pressing both banks full to the brim, which flowed through the being of our blessed Lord.

Sometime when your body is entirely free from weakness or disease of any kind, when you are on terms of the most loving intimacy with God and man, when the air seems like the tabled food of the Greek gods, and the arching firmanent is a curtain of amethyst adorned with silver-encircled diamonds of light, when it is an exquisite luxury to breathe and an unspeakable delight to love and a profound joy to pray, when you think of God as a Father and of man as a brother,—then you may know something of the meaning of life as a tide setting in toward the shore, rising over dead seaweed, washing the dull pebbles into a brighter color, filling every little nook and inlet, and splashing its crested foam even over the highest watermark of an ordinary sea rising. But even all that must be far below the existence of Christ, who lived on the Godward side as we never do. Nay, in him it was not alone a tide ebbing and flowing; it was the ocean itself, causing tides of human movement, itself the source and fountain of all most heavenly, most divine.

In Christ was life, because his moral fibre and tissue were free from disease; every faculty of his soul worked without friction. The parts were all perfectly adjusted. They moved in due harmony of proportion. The benumbing hand of sin was never laid on his pure existence. Temptation he knew, but not the shame of yielding. Sorrow was his guest, but never remorse. Prayer was his daily breath, but never a prayer of repentance. The vision of his soul was clear. The beating of his heart was true. The grasp of his thought was firm. Woe to us if Christ was not sinless! He could lay no claim to the possession of a unique life if he had once let that robber, Sin, break into the sanctity of his person. He has broken into every other soul. He has robbed us of air and light and other jewels of full-adorned existence; but he was not able to overcome our Lord and Master. And the life that was in him suffered no loss, but was rich with a wealth that never knew theft or repression. "The wages of sin is death," and in Christ was life, because he never knew even the slightest shock of that paralysis which the human race has all felt since it chose freely between good and evil.

But also in Christ was life, because of the life he could give to others. That is to have life indeed! To have enough and to spare,—that is the wonder of it! To be able to give out so abundantly and continuously and yet reserve the greatest exhibition for the very last—that is power! For he rose of himself from the dead. He said he had power to lay his life down and power to take it again.

No man saw Christ's resurrection. It was a sight too awful in its unparalleled solemnity and tremendous mysteriousness for even the glittering angel who rolled back the stone and sat upon it—even for him to behold. And yet that angel was so like a frozen flash of light in his majestic splendor, that as he suddenly shot down out of a clear sky, the hardened, brutal, stolid, indifferent, yet military machines of Roman soldiers, fell like dead men in their fright all around the tomb.

No, not even the heavenly messenger, who had doubtless seen many a wonderful sight in heaven's regions before the presence of innumerable other beings like himself, not even he was permitted to witness the coming to life of our Lord and Saviour. Alone, the spirit of warmth and color and motion came back into that form once racked with torture on the cross. Was it a gradual arising, a glow of transformation, gentle, almost imperceptible, like the rosy flush that sometimes creeps over the scattered clouds resting near the sunrising? Or did the form rise at once, the Jesus of life, the same, yet different, the print of the nail in his hands and the spear-thrust in the side yet visible, but the form itself passing out of the cold, dark sepulchre into the peaceful perfume of that garden, so different from Gethsemane, now rolled away into the past, but never to be effaced from the heart or memory of redeemed mankind?

THE ANGEL OF THE LORD DESCENDED FROM HEAVEN AND ROLLED BACK THE STONE

How shall we ever know how it was done? Enough for us that it was done. The Lord of life and glory conquered the last grim enemy. How he must have fallen in impotent rage on hell's black threshold as Christ shook off his clammy fetters and swept them into the farthest corner of the tomb, folded the garments of his burial with a calmness which betokened no hasty terror of his ghastly surroundings, and with the first breath of his newly created being, dissolved once and forever the icy chill of death's embraces! "O death, where is thy sting? O grav where is thy victory?" Ete nal life has driven thee o of thy stronghold. Henc forth thou art doomed t skulk through the world, no longer a terror to the Chri tian. Thou smiter of the body, thou raging but powe less enemy of the body, smite that, if thou choosest
What care we! Can'st thou touch the soul? The Chri who took our nature went to meet thee for our sake and far from finding thee a formidable foe, after lettin thee do thy worst, after three days of contact with th coldness and stillness and darkness, he rose again, an thou could'st not prevent it, although all hell wer summoned to assist thee. Truly in him was life!

We read the story of Christ. We carelessly discus the words. We pick here and there a blossom from thi plant of twenty centuries. But still we have not swep more than one string of the instrument that shall here after sing his power. I expect to know him sometim as he was on earth. It will be a part of eternity's les son to study the Incarnation
But until that more perfect tim shall come, before heaven's gate of pearl shall swing open t disclose the beauties of tha celestial throne of God to my enraptured soul, Christ shall b to me my life, a foretaste o heaven on earth, a breath o being which shall grow into a eternity of existence like his.

"He that hath the Son hath life." I do not know any way in which we can find out the truth about such a statement a this of John's except by finding out who and what Christ was.
The statement is plain and unmistakable. "He that hath the Son hath the life." This is the same as saying the priniple of true life has been discovered, and it is not in philosophy, it is not in scientific discoveries, it is not in moral precepts, it is not in anything except the Son of God. "He that hath the Son hath the life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life."

I am going to study this Son of God. I am beginning to be interested in him. I am intensely so; for if this statement is true, I am either in the possession of the eternal life or I am not. I find then that this Person was in very many things unlike any other person; I find he made claims never before made by mortal man; I find he lived as never man lived, and spake as never man spake. All that reassures me. If I am really approaching the mysterious principle of life, I am glad to find in the Person who claims it nothing to make me distrust his authority so far as character is concerned. I then go farther; I test him. I find that the persons in all ages who have been most Christlike, who have had the most of him in thought and action, have been persons who have lived closest to God of any people the world ever saw, and believed most peacefully in a world to come, and died most hopefully in the trust of a glorious resurrection. I then apply this trust to myself. I let this Christ govern my own actions. I set up a throne in my own soul and say to him, "Rule thou there." And the result is a new life to me. Capable of proof? Indeed it is. Can I not tell the difference between the old man and the new? Am I a fool on the spiritual side when all my senses are good on the mental nd intellectual? Now in all this what have I done? Have I not planted the Christ in my being, and have ot the fruits of that planting proved that in him is life? Has John told a lie or an impossibility when he says, He that hath the Son hath the life?" Is not our Lord illing that men should believe by thrusting their hands nto his side? "O taste and see that the Lord is good." Try me! prove me!" says the Divine.

"Ye will not come to me, that ye may have life," ays Christ. There is a great deal more in this statement than we are willing to acknowledge. ut Christianity to me is not mysticism. is not shadowy with spiritual truths; it resplendent with them; and these spiritual truths are as capable of proof as anything in chemistry or science. Can I tell there is life in me, eternal life? And hall a tide set in like that and we not now it as it rises in us from that coastless ocean of eternity which we shall sometime fill over, and which, with its resistless overflowing, buries out of sight proud, dry boulders that stood on the barren beach f our contented morality, and sweeps on nd in until every nook and inlet is filled ll of the pressure that speaks of the dine force back of it? Shall all this be a matter of conjecture to us? Shall it not e, is it not, the most tremendous fact of cts, the truth of all truths, the science spirituality which is not contented, any ore than the science of physical matter, ith shadowy possibilities?

We have not tested our spirituality. We ave not really planted the Christ in us. e have dissected and analysed and dened and illustrated, but we have not lanted and tested. If Christ is not the fe of the world, cannot the world disover by trying? Shall a statement so reat as this be made about a person so ell known as Jesus, and be incapable of emonstration? I say there is life in a ed. I plant it. I prove it. I say ere is life in Jesus Christ. I plant him the being and I prove it. The world planting a piece of the crust or a piece the kernel; but let it plant the germ the seed, not simply that which nourhes and surrounds the germ. Shall we tain eternal life by a trust in moral recepts, intellectual energy, inventive search, mental activity? All these ings are splendid. They will accompany e true life. They are in one sense a rt of it. But they are not the life. The life is the on of God, and the only way to find that out is try him for yourselves. A sceptic once said to me, I will never believe in Christianity until I myself am nverted. Then I cannot help believing." Do you ppose Paul questioned the reality of his new life after eeting the Christ on the road to Damascus? Why, was the reality of realities to him! So that he said with burst of triumphant certainty, "That life which I now live, I live in the faith which is in the Son of God!" I wonder if there is anybody here now who does not want eternal life. Are we so dead sick of the whole scheme of existence that we don't care whether it goes on or not? I meet people sometimes who talk that way. But I can hardly believe them. Life is a divine thing. To be careless of it, ignorant about it, is to miss the one end of all true living altogether. If Jesus Christ is the life of the world, I want it. I don't want any cheap imitation. I want the real thing. Think of it my brother, my sister! Eternal life! It begins here. It goes on hereafter. And what a hereafter! No more crying or trouble; no more weakness or unjust criticism; no more wickedness or selfishness or contempt of goodness on the part of men to drive our souls into despair for all tender and true things; no more battling with ourselves as passion rises over peace and threatens to drown the very soul, but a life that shall awake to sweetness, and light and power undimmed and undisturbed. It has the germ of Jesus Christ in it. It will surely grow. I feel like a god here sometimes. Give me all heaven to expand in, and all eternity to grow in, and what a life I can live! This eternal life is possible for all of us. Is it not true, if any one here has not the Son of God, he may have him? "He that will, let him take the water of life freely." It won't cost you anything but the acceptance of it.

"SHE TURNED HERSELF AND SAITH UNTO HIM, RABBONI"

Confront your soul with the life of the world. Ask yourself if you have this life in you. Who am I, or any other preacher of the Gospel of the Son of God, to emphasize more than is necessary or right, any statement that has so much that is amazing as this statement by the man John? But putting it with everything else we know to be true of this Being called our Saviour, remembering his own great yearning compassion for the souls of men, calling to mind the meaning of the words saved and lost, I ask myself, "Can any earthly preacher emphasize too much the eternal life, or warn and urge, and beseech men to take the eternal life into their own?" If this were my last message, if to-day I knew to-morrow's light would break upon my soul in Paradise, and all of earth should be no more than memory, I would not rest contented until I knew some one of you had given his heart to the life of the world. And if I knew that this entire audience had accepted this Son of God, what a message I could bear up to the throne, of his undying interest in humanity! The most exultant song I ever sang would be the song of victory for the souls redeemed here now. "Now is the acceptable time, now is the day of Salvation. To-day, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts."

The Christ has knocked a long time, has called for years. He stretches out his bleeding hands continually. The Spirit prays with groanings that cannot be uttered. My son, give me thine heart! The love that passes that of man or woman calls for its children. Despise him not! Grieve not the Spirit; but with eternal life possible, oh, do not make it impossible by your own act! Can God do any more? Has he not given his only Son? Can the Son do any more? Has he not given the Comforter? "Ye must be born again," says the Master. What! thou proud soul of humanity! Wilt thou lose the one great end of existence? No, no. Eternal life is my possession! I will say to that divine Sufferer who has been cruelly nailed to the cross by scorn and denial of God, forgive me! I will love thee! I will serve thee! I will make thee mine. In thy kingdom in heaven give me the humblest place and I will spend eternity in learning what I missed on earth; for thou only art eternal life, for thou only art eternal love! "He that hath the Son, hath the life." Who will say now, "As for me I will have this eternal life—I will live the life of Christ?"

PROMINENT MEN of the HOUR

Dr. William Osler, who caused much discussion by his statement that a man does no original work after forty, has left Johns Hopkins University, to accept a position in an English institution. It is interesting to note, that Dr. Osler is himself well by the forteth milestone, and still doing original work. Although much of his life has been passed in the United States he is a Canadian by birth.

General Linievitch is the new commander-in-chief of the Russian forces in Manchuria. He has served throughout the campaign, and is considered a good soldier; whether he can do better than the former commander, with the means at his disposal, is exceedingly doubtful. He was wounded on the march to Peking, during the Boxer uprising. The Japanese forces that accompanied him on that expedition are now opposing him in the field.

Dr. Herman V. Hilprecht, Curator of the Babylonian section of the Free Museum of Science and Art of the University of Pennsylvania, has resigned, and will carry on his work in Germany. He is the most famous Assyriologist in America, and his departure will be keenly felt. His work has been frequently referred to in the columns of The Christian Herald.

Judge Charles E. Magoon has just been appointed Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, by President Roosevelt. Judge Magoon has proved himself an active man of affairs, as well as an able lawyer, and his selection will undoubtedly put new life in the national movement for the completion of the canal. The President made a clean sweep of the former commission, and has replaced it with new men.

Baron Gautch von Frankenthurn is the recently-appointed Austro-Hungarian premier. The position is the most exacting in Europe, as its occupant has to act as a buffer between the discordant elements of the two countries. At present he is trying to maintain the integrity of the empire, which has been nearly swamped by the demands of Hungary.

LISTENING TO THE PHONOGRAPH

Christian Work in the Japanese Army

FOR the first time in the history of Christian missions in Japan, active Christian work, authorized by the Japanese Government, has been begun in behalf of the soldiers doing service at the actual seat of war. Nor has this authorization by the Government been a mere tacit consent. Foreign residence has been permitted in otherwise closed territory. Supplies have been transported by army conveyances, secretaries have been afforded conveyance on transports and railways not open for general service.

C. V. HIBBARD
Secretary Y. M. C. A. Army Work in Japan

There are now nine Young Men's Christian Association Secretaries working among Japanese soldiers, at five important military bases in Manchuria, including Dalny and New Chwang. Permission to carry on this work was granted in the fall of 1904, after all other attempts to get permission for Christian work at the front had failed. The movement is similar to that inaugurated with the American soldiers during the Spanish-American war and has been attended with marked success. As a result of the humanitarian side of the work, it is favorably known from Chinnampo to the outposts beyond Mukden.

At the different stations large tents have been erected, or, where possible, the officials have granted the use of buildings, and in these the work is conducted. At Yingkow, the commanding officer set a force of twenty-six carpenters at work for three weeks repairing and remodeling the building for the Association's use. The practical nature of the work may be seen in the kind of supplies sent—books, magazines, correspondence facilities, talking machines, games, bath tubs, soap, hair clippers, tea outfits, needles, buttons and thread, in addition to Bibles, religious tracts and hymn books. The importance of the correspondence facilities alone cannot be overestimated. In the first six weeks 50,000 pieces of stationery were distributed bearing the Association's imprint. This means that already there has gone into thousands of Japanese homes where the name of Christ is unknown, and also into homes where prejudice against the Christian religion has hitherto existed, a report of this Christian effort and of the unselfish spirit which animates it. Can there be any doubt as to the result? These letters, going into homes where every letter from the front is an event, cannot fail to influence public opinion toward Christianity in Japan. That this is so, is apparent from the tone of the newspaper notice in Japanese papers. The universal testimony is that Buddhism would never have done this thing, and cannot even imitate it.

The definite religious work is beginning to tell in a very real way. Contrary to the general expectation, there is a strong religious interest among the men. As a certain colonel said, "There are a lot of men about headquarters, but as nearly as I can see, they all pray to some divinity. I tell you, when a man comes to the battlefield, he thinks a lot about religion." Invariably the men listen well at the meetings; wet eyes are not unknown, and to an earnest Christian worker with full command of the language, the opportunity is limited only by his endurance. Christian men have helped and been helped, and often in the case of men who have once been under Christian influence but later slipped away, it has been possible to turn their interest again toward Christianity.

When Mr. Hibbard, the first American appointed as Army Secretary, reached the front, he was greeted by the soldiers with the cry, "See the Russian spy!" but it took only a short time to convince the men of their mistake, and soon the greeting changed to one of endearment. The army work is now known among them as "the mother of soldiers."

The hospitals at the front and in Japan are proving a rich field of effort, some of them containing as high as 15,000 sick and wounded. The Secretary at one of the Manchurian points writes of one of his hospital visits, "The head of the hospital took me through the different wards, in each of which he introduced me as 'The American Y. M. C. A. man who had come to comfort the soldiers,' and in each room as we withdrew, he closed the ceremonies by saying, 'Now this gentleman understands Japanese very well; thank him!' There had been more than sufficient thanks before, but this never failed to bring forth a shower of gratitude." The phonograph is used with good advantage in the hospital work, and the wan faces light up as the strains of some familiar Japanese air are wafted through the wards, and often the way is thus opened for the word about the One who was filled with compassion at the sight of suffering and need.

An encouraging sign is the interest being taken in Y. M. C. A. work movement by Japanese officials and other prominent persons. On Saturday, Feb. 11, the Tokyo Young Men's Christian Association held in the Imperial Conservatory of Music a concert in behalf of the Army Department of the Association. An audience of over 1,200 crowded the spacious hall. The occasion was honored by the presence of H. I. H. Princess Kanin. Among others present were Sir Claude MacDonald, the British Minister, Count Arco Valley, the German Minister, Count Vinci, the Italian Minister, Baroness d'Anathan, wife of the Belgian Minister, and Mrs. Lloyd C. Griscom, wife of the American Minister. Among the prominent Japanese ladies who assisted in preparations for the concert, were Marchioness Oyama, the wife of Field Marshal Oyama, Marchioness Nabeshima, Baroness Sannomiya, wife of Master of Ceremonies to the Emperor, Countess Toda, wife of Vice-Master of Ceremonies to the Emperor, and Miss Kagawa, Lady in Waiting to the Empress, and daughter of Master of Ceremonies to the Emperor. Contributions have been received from Prince Fushimi, who has recently returned from America, and from Princess Kanin, Princess Nashimoto, and Princess Higashi-Fushimi. Baron Mitsui, the head of one of the largest firms in the country, has contributed 2,500 yen, and Mr. K. Murai contributed 500 yen.

Reports of the interest taken in t work by parties in America, have d much to stimulate the interest in Jap The work has continued to grow, so as demand the largest financial resour possible.

That this practical movement is co mending itself to the highest officials w have to do with the conduct of the w is seen by the following. SUBSCRIBERS APPRECIATE "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" PREMIUMS

I have received the premium books and Beauty Calendar, for which I thank you. The Crown Dictionary is just the book I have long needed for handy reference. Good Manners for All Occasions is indeed useful. The Beauty Calendar is superb, the combination of birds, babies and flowers is a pleasant surprise, making this the prettiest Calendar you have given us. For each and all I thank you many times. Last, though not least, is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which I think grows better each year. I have been a constant reader for eight years, and think I cannot do without it.

Waltham, Mass. ABBIE A. SMITH.

The Red Letter Premium Bible and Crown Dictionary received. I am well pleased with each, and regard the latter as a most superb work, in connection with the Crown Encyclopedia. The two meet the wants of the masses most intelligently.

Ashland, Ohio. B. J. URBAN

The handsome book Good Manners received, and I am charmed with it; but I am not surprised, for we always get something fine from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

ZELOPHEHAD'S DAUGHTERS

BY GRACE C. WHITE

SPRING was stealing upon New England, and light-heartedness upon the young people of Canaan. The restraint of winter was over; the freedom of open doors and windows was close at hand, and all Canaan seemed to be awaking from a long, restful sleep.

Sylvia Thorne sat in the doorway of her home, absorbed in the daily paper, while the warm spring sunshine touched her soft brown hair with gold. "Oh, dear, mother, just hear this," she suddenly called. "'Rev. J. P. Tupper, of Milton, will occupy the pulpit of the Congregational Church in this place the 28th, in exchange with Rev. L. L. Lewis.' The 28th! why tomorrow will be the 28th! I do think it is too bad for Mr. Lewis to have that dry, prosy old minister come here to preach now."

"Sylvia, I am surprised at you," remonstrated her mother. "I enjoy Mr. Tupper's sermons, and always find them helpful."

"Helpful! Why, mother, you don't need to hear sermons of that sort any more than the minister himself does. Of course Mr. Tupper is good, and everybody respects him and all that, but he is so uninteresting to young people."

"I do not like to hear you speak in this way of any minister, especially a man like Mr. Tupper. If the young people go to church with the spirit they ought to have, and try to be interested, I am sure he will give them ample food for thought, and such as will make them all the better for having heard him."

Sylvia said no more; but that afternoon, at the Young People's Sewing Society, the matter of the pulpit exchange was discussed with animation.

"I think it's too bad, too," said Edith Jordan, sympathizing with Sylvia's views. "I told mother when I saw that in the paper, that I wasn't going to church, but she said if I had no better reason for staying away than that, she should certainly expect me to go, and you all know what that means."

There was an almost universal exclamation of "That's just the way I felt," and one and another declared they were very sorry they had said so much against going, because now their people would be sure to make it hard for them to stay at home.

At last it was agreed that without further protest they would all attend church, and when Martha Edson added "Let's all pay just as good attention as we can, so we shall know what the things are that our mothers find so enjoyable and helpful," it met with acquiescence, although it was evident that the spirit of criticism was the motive, more than a desire to get good.

Sunday morning came, the most perfect of all the spring days that had so delighted the young people, and the church was unusually well filled.

With the opening strains of the voluntary, Mr. Tupper walked up the steps to the pulpit, looking a veritable saint with his benign face, snow-white hair and reverential bearing. The preacher wore a look of rare pleasure when he arose, and looking over the audience said, "I am glad to see so many young ladies before me this beautiful spring morning, for I have brought a message especially to you who are in the beautiful springtime of life, the words of which are found in my text: Numbers 26: 33—'And Zelophehad had five daughters.'"

Scarcely a girl could refrain from a surreptitious glance at her nearest girl friend, but Zelophehad and his daughters were unknown to them all. Who was he? Through the mind of each ran the thought, "Zelophehad! Zelophehad! Why, I never heard that name before."

It is not strange that there was a feeling of amusement among the mothers that Mr. Tupper should thus so naively, at the outset, claim the attention of his unwilling listeners.

Zelophehad's household was most remarkable, as he portrayed it. The father, happy in the companionship of five daughters devoted to his interests and comfort.

"He alone of all the tribes of Israel had no sons. Age was creeping upon him, and with him would end, according to the tribal laws, those cherished rights inherited from his ancestor, Manasseh. Up to this time, sons were the cherished portion of a family, but Zelophehad had been blessed with five daughters, whom history recounts as worthy. No one more virtuous or gifted or meritorious than another; so united in sisterly love and filial devotion that wherever the name of one is found, each other one is named with equal definiteness. So worthy were they that the first exception to the law governing the descent of property was made in their behalf, and they became the first property-holders recorded in history. Besides, an especial law concerning marriage was created in their behalf, for of great moment is it, dear daughter hearers, to be worthy."

Before the sermon was over there was not a girl in the audience who was not well acquainted with Zelophehad and his daughters, whose scrupulous housekeeping would have delighted even the most fastidious mother of the present day. It was the careful attention to the details of daily duties that makes the perfection of housekeeping, and the home charming, and yet the unsparing preacher told his hearers with a smile of encouragement that "what these daughters did was not more than should be expected of every worthy daughter."

That home in the land of Canaan kept by the five conscientious housekeepers, stood out before their mind's eye as clearly as if Mr. Tupper had but recently visited there, and was recounting to them a personal experience. He held them up as an example to be copied, and made the sin of irritability and discord in the home appear in a most unlovely light.

They need not have pledged their good attention, for they gave it perforce, and were moved to twinges of conscience by his practical applications, as no sermon of their own pastor had ever done, and having heard, they knew they could not forget.

"Well, daughters," said Mr. Thorne, as they sat at dinner; "we had a very practical sermon to-day, and a very helpful one. Did you enjoy it?"

Sylvia's face was crimson in a moment, for she knew her father's question was the result of what she had said to her mother the morning before.

"No, sir. I don't think I enjoyed it at all," she answered, without looking up.

"But you were interested, weren't you, daughter?"

"Yes, sir, very much. One couldn't help being that; but I am sure I had rather not have made so intimate an acquaintance with Mr. Zelophehad's daughters."

"Came just a little too near to spring dressmaking and house-cleaning time; eh, daughter? Well, he did talk pretty straight to you prospective housekeepers."

Wisely the subject was dropped here, and was not mentioned again for many weeks, and then it was not intended for any but Margaret's ears to hear.

They were deep in the toils of housecleaning, when Mrs. Thorne, coming into the adjoining room, heard Sylvia exclaim almost impatiently, "Oh, dear me. I do wish I had never heard of those five paragon daughters of Zelophehad. You can't slight a single thing after hearing that sermon without a condemning sense of what Zelophehad's folks would have done, and of course if you want any peace, everything's got to be done upon honor for conscience's sake."

"I know it," said Margaret, laying down her tack-hammer; "that's just the way I feel, as if every small detail had suddenly acquired a right to demand my very best effort, and the queerest part is, all of the girls feel just as we do."

Now that they are freeing their minds, Sylvia further confided that for awhile Edith Jordan almost hated the sound of Zelophehad's name, for if she didn't happen to sweep under the rug, or brush behind the pictures, five reproachful faces seemed to look out from behind them at her, and she had many a time gone back and done the thing over to get rid of a feeling of condemnation.

Two years after this, Mr. Tupper was at a conference of churches in Canaan, and the young people were there. Saintly and dignified as ever, he was surrounded by bright young girls, who were telling him something that, while it amused him, was of g[illegible] moment to them, but only one remark was overheard, and that was when Sylvia said, "We never have been able to break off our intimacy with Zelophehad's daughters since that Sunday morning you had us spend with them, and really our good works that you are complimenting us upon date from that sermon."

LILIES

TALL lilies in my garden grow,
And light winds sway them to and fro,
And subtle perfume rare and sweet,
Like incense, Easter morning greet.
An emblem of thy empty tomb,
And in thy breath set all abloom;
An Easter symphony, dear Lord,
With singing bird and brook a-chord.

High-priests of purity bend low,
With hearts of gold and forms of snow,
And whisper to the ear that leans,
All that the Resurrection means.
To your own spotlessness akin
Are the sweet eyes which gaze within,
Then whisper of the love which led
Christ to the Cross whereon he bled,
Each petal white a pearly key
To what is meant by Calvary.
A perfumed page where all may read
That Christ is risen—is risen indeed.

An Appeal for Prayer

FROM a correspondent in Washington, D. C., comes an appeal for prayer. He says "there has never been such a concerted movement in Washington as now, reaching out after better things." It is not that unconverted people in unusual numbers are coming to the churches, but that lethargic Christians are awakening, and are striving to get right with God. He believes, and rightly, that this is a hopeful sign, and he begs that Christians everywhere, will join in prayer that it may develop into a revival, that, beginning in the capital, it may spread to every state and city in the country.

There is no question that a revival usually begins in the church. It is when Christians turn away from frivolous amusements and from avaricious schemes, to the sublime verities of religion and a realization of their duty to God and to the world, that the revival spirit is manifested. God is ready to bless, but the churches are not in earnest in seeking the blessing. The members are intent on their merchandise, on their social ambitions and their financial speculations, and have neither time nor thought to give to their higher duties. When they realize that they are neglecting the main concern of life; when their affections are taken off the things that are seen and temporal, and are fixed on those that are spiritual and eternal, the revival will come. It will be, as its name implies, a revival of religion already existing in latent state in the heart of the converted man. A revival, as someone has said, is simply Christianity in earnest. The outside world is sceptical about the sincerity of a Christian, who professes to believe in the overwhelming importance of religion, yet who lets it occupy but a small portion of his life, and makes no effort to impart it to his own friends and associates.

If, as our correspondent believes, there is in Washington evidence that Christians themselves are awakening, we may hope for a manifestation of power. There are churches in every city where a soul aroused and anxious for salvation, would find no sympathy, no help. So far from making efforts to win souls, the members do not know how, or will not take the trouble to guide and direct an awakened soul to the Cross. This is the great obstacle to a revival. When Christians are stirred; when they not only pray for the outpouring of the Spirit, but seek among their friends for those who are unconverted, and urge them to seek Christ, then there is hope. While there is indifference, laxity of life, coldness and worldliness in the church, sinners are not drawn to it, nor does God give it the power to win souls. It is therefore a sign of promise, when, in any city, there is a movement among Christians in the direction of a closer walk with God, a desire to reach a higher attainment in spiritual life, a cleansing and purifying of character. It will surely be followed by a concern for the unconverted, and when that exists, God will grant a harvest of souls.

A Song of New Life

EASTER is with us once more, with all the joyful significance with which the time is filled. The long, cold winter is over, the gray old earth spreads her cloak of green, inviting the pressure of our feet, as we search for unfolding buds and blossoms. Nature once more has fulfilled her promise of giving new life to the prisoners she has guarded so closely, hidden in the dark earth since the time of falling leaves. The flowers that now open so joyously at touch of sun were only sleeping, patiently waiting for the time of singing birds and their own awakening.

In human lives it is much the same, only we do not have the faith to believe and the patience to wait for our Easter awakening. We bury our hopes and ambitions, covering them with the dead leaves of vain regrets, not realizing that from their graves may spring hopes far more worthy of our care, ambitions far nobler in their objects. The winter, the cold and the storm, are as necessary to our growth, to our strength of soul, to our renewal of life, as the long season of darkness and imprisonment are to the children of the woodland. We are not hothouse flowers, forced to bloom all the year round, which wither at the first touch of strong wind or burning sun.

If the roots of our faith strike deeper year after year, and our trust strengthens in the winter of our lives, then when the Easter awakening comes, who shall measure the joy which floods the heart that is lifted in praise to the Giver of all?

Girlhood Then and Now

IN another part of this issue we print a series of letters from well-known American women. It is the general impression that, in no equal space of time of the world's history, has there been such a general change in the conditions of life as within the last twenty or thirty years. This is especially true in regard to women. It has been the aim of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in arranging for this Symposium, to get the views of women who have made their mark in the world, in various lines of activity, educational, literary, philanthropic, etc. Although they have written from widely different viewpoints, the general deductions are the same, that women are better for their advantages in education and business, and make better wives and mothers as a result of the "higher" education, as they can take part in the interests of their children as they grow up, and not have the mortification and sorrow of seeing them grow away from their influence.

The question has often been raised whether women have not lost, as well as gained, by recent changes. It is true that in most cases the question comes from the masculine part of the community. The feminine portion, however, as a majority stoutly maintain that this is far from being the case, that a true woman is womanly in any circumstance, and that she has lost none of her distinctive feminine charm.

It is undeniable that the woman with a so-called career, has, in many cases, had that career thrust upon her by the necessity of earning not only her own bread, but that of another as well, whom misfortune has made dependent upon her. Few of the really famous women took up the pen, the brush, or went into business, from the selfish desire to seek the applause or admiration of the world. The biographies of famous women show this most plainly. But it is often deplorable, when girls with comfortable homes, and fathers ready and glad to support them, strike out into the rush and feverish swirl of the world of business. With so many calls for active service, that give no financial compensation, but are filled with honor, it would be well for the prosperous girl seeking a position to consider whether she should not follow one of these, and not run the risk of depriving another of much-needed employment.

We are sure that the Symposium will appeal to many people who have compared the education and general upbringing of their children with that of their own youth. It would seem that, despite the rush of the Twentieth Century, and the hundred open avenues that branch out from life's highway, that the boys and girls of to-day have the same hearts, the same aspirations and ambitions as the young people of a generation ago. They are a revised edition of the same human book, in a new binding and with a wider circulation.

The Passing of the Fleets

SOME natural surprise has been occasioned by the announcement that England has sold a great fleet of warships, consisting of thirteen battleships, nine armored cruisers, fourteen protected cruisers, twenty third-class protected cruisers, eight unprotected cruisers, one coast-defence ship, and twenty torpedo boats, besides some thirty-four armored sloops and gunboats. This formidable naval array (which cost over $15,000,000) though comparatively modern, and constituting a far more powerful force than any one of the fleets engaged in most of the famous naval battles of the world, from Salamis to Manila Bay, was sacrificed for less than $700,000. Such is the fertility of our age in man-killing devices, that the battleship of yesterday is superseded by the battleship of to-day. Long before the first decade of the century is rounded out, the proud fleets of to-day, our own gallant squadrons among them, will be superannuated, and either engaged in peaceful pursuits, or relegated to the junkshop.

Whatever its ultimate fate, the out-of-date fleet represents a tremendous financial sacrifice upon the nation to which it belongs. That this fact will shortly be emphasized as a result of the Russo-Japanese Wa seems now tolerably certain. "Any work on scien that is ten years old, is out of date," is the dictum the great libraries, and the science of war is apparentl the most rapid of all. Human ingenuity exhausts i self in intricate, costly schemes for wholesale slaughte There are no considerations of humanity or brotherl kindness in the case; no pretence of a desire to min mize suffering. What civilization wants, and what it willing to pay for most liberally, is the machine tha can mow down, maim and slay the largest number human beings with the greatest dispatch.

We are yet a very long way off from that blesse time when "war will be no more"; but we may b much nearer to the complete revolutionizing of warfar than we think. It has already become so costly as t be well nigh prohibitive. It does not require a ver powerful mental effort to imagine a new mechanica triumph (from which quarter will it come?) that wil relegate modern armies and their equipment to th ranks of the unserviceables, and navies and submarine to the limbo of costly follies, while the command, n longer of sea or land, but of the ambient air, alon gives absolute mastery of the situation. What a tum ble-down of national prestige and naval and militar pretensions there would be all over the globe, wer some new genius suddenly to arise, and demonstrate be yond all dispute that the conqueror's vantage groun of the future is to be the open air!

Among the Workers

—E. A. VAIL, Superintendent of the Union Gospe Mission, 1629 Polymnia Street, New Orleans, write that funds are greatly needed to keep up the home missionary work in that city during the coming summer.

—EVANGELIST C. R. HAUDENSCHIELD lately conducted a revival campaign in Anaconda, Mont., for three weeks, meetings being held three times a day; 165 persons made an open profession of their faith in Christ. He is now in meetings at Lewistown, Mont.

—MISSIONARY JOHN G. PATON, of the New Hebrides Mission, writes acknowledging contributions from our readers, and adds: "We have yet above 40,000 savage heathens, every now and again indulging in their cannibal feasts and orgies, but who, by the Holy Spirit's power in the teaching of Jesus Christ, are gradually becoming Christians, and giving up all their heathen practices."

—REVS. L. B. CROSLEY, of Crystal, N. D., and George Clark, of Hannah, N. D., assisted in a series of successful evangelistic meetings at Calvin, N. D. Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians united in the movement. Several professed conversion and Christians were strengthened. Precedent to the opening of the meetings, a ten days' series of prayer meetings were held, during which some took a stand for Christ.

—REV. MILTON S. REES, assisted by several local pastors, has lately conducted a series of very successful revival meetings at Sunbury, Pa. The co-operating clergymen included Rev. O. G. Morton (Pres.), Rev. Frank Gardner (Bapt.), Rev. J. Francis Smith (U. B.), Rev. G. W. Marquand (United Evan.), Rev. E. A. Rayner (M. E.), Rev. C. H. Brosius (Lutheran), Rev. J. W. Rue (M. E.), Rev. J. H. Weber (Lutheran). The movement was the most remarkable ever known in that section, and was productive of great spiritual results.

—ROARING SPRING is a beautiful town of nearly two thousand souls, in Central Pennsylvania. The town contains two large manufactories—a paper mill and book factory. There are five churches. A deep religious and moral tendency prevails, and the temperance sentiment is strong. Seventy-five per cent. attend the religious services and Sunday Schools. Roaring Spring has the largest percentage of attendance at Sunday School of any town in Pennsylvania. There has been no license granted for the sale of intoxicants for a score of years or more. Good revival meetings are in progress in several of the churches at this time.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Killed in a Mine

EARLY on the morning of April 3d, there was an explosion in the Zeigler mine, near Benton, Ill., which caused the death of forty-three men, and serious injuries to many others. It was a Monday morning, and the men were proceeding to their work after the Sunday's rest. The cage used in descending to the workings had gone down four times, each time conveying a full load of workers, when there was a terrific explosion, which was perceptible over a circuit of twelve miles. The whole mouth of the mine was blown out, killing one miner and injuring four others who were waiting on the surface for the next descent of the cage. The cage itself at the bottom of the shaft, was sent by the force of the explosion to the top, a distance of five hundred feet. It was realized at once that there was little hope that any of the fifty men who had gone down could have survived. A rescue work was, however, immediately commenced by the miners who were coming to the day's labor. A number of employees of the mine who were out on strike, also offered their services. It was impossible to descend by the main shaft, as that had been utterly wrecked, but men were lowered by hand down the air shaft. They were repeatedly overcome by the deadly after-damp, but succeeded in raising to the surface all who had survived the shock. Forty-three men, however had been killed. It is now remembered that a former employee of the mine, as long ago as October last, had predicted just such a catastrophe as likely to occur. He contended that the ventilation of the shaft was defective, and would some day result in an explosion. A different conclusion, however, was reached by the Coroner's jury, after an investigation covering two days. They were of opinion that the explosion resulted from the discharge of blasting powder, which had been placed in the mine by persons unknown. Whether the calamity was caused by the negligence of the owners in not properly ventilating the shaft, or by the malevolence of wicked persons, may perhaps never be certainly known. The sad fact that we do know, is that lives have been lost, women widowed and children made fatherless by a catastrophe which ought never to have occurred. Punishment on the parties responsible may never be inflicted in this world, but they are known to God, from whose righteous judgment they cannot escape.

God shall bring every work into judgment and every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil (Eccles. 12: 14).

CHILDREN OF THE ZEIGLER MINERS

THE TOWN OF ZEIGLER, WHERE THE FATAL EXPLOSION OCCURRED

An Absent-Minded Mother

The strange forgetfulness of a mother is reported in a press despatch from a small town in Illinois. She went on a visit to some friends in a town a short distance away, taking with her her infant, who is about two months old. Returning in the evening, the little one became drowsy, and the mother made it comfortable on one of the car seats. When she reached her own station, she saw her sister on the platform and hurried out to speak to her, leaving her baby asleep on the seat. The two women were interested in their talk and walked home together. Suddenly, the thought of her child occurred to the mother, and in an agony of distress she rushed back to the station. Telegrams were sent after the train, but it was an express, and was not caught until it had traveled nearly two hundred miles. The trainmen made a search as directed, and found the child still sleeping calmly on its strange bed. It was brought back on the next train, and was restored unhurt to its distressed mother. Seldom, indeed, is there such an instance of forgetfulness; that it is possible, however, is evident, and it gives added force to the prophet's assurance of the fidelity of God to his people.

Can a woman forget her sucking child? Yea, she may forget, yet will I not forget thee (Isa. 49:15).

Traveling Hills

A remarkable phenomenon is described by a visitor who recently traveled in Montana. He says that a large section of land near Butte has begun to "creep." It comprises the larger part of the big hill upon which the Anaconda mines are situated. Surveyors' measurements show that the entire hill has made a very perceptible movement southward. At the foot of Anaconda Hill the slide pushed the tracks of the street railway line about six inches. As there are no large buildings in that part of the city, no damage was done except to the railroad tracks, and but for their displacement the slide would not have been noticed. Geologists and scientific men say that the entire range of mountains about Butte is constantly moving, and that the sliding process which has been going on for ages has crushed and mixed the copper veins and bodies in the Butte district and displaced many of them, is still going on. The statement is made by well-known mining men that the cellar of a shaft of the Green Mountain Mine, one of the Anaconda properties, has moved about seven feet in ten years. The phenomenon is regarded with interest by scientific men, but no danger is feared from it. Evidently we must not speak any more of the eternal hills, nor use the figure of the mountain as a metaphor of permanence. It appears that even they may move, but more stable even than they, is the kindness of God to those who serve him.

For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee (Isa. 54:10).

An Astronomical Discovery

From Los Angeles comes to the New York Times, the story of an extraordinary discovery. It has been made by Prof. E. E. Barnard, with the new telescope constructed after the professor's own design and just erected on the summit of Wilson's Peak. The part of the heavens that Prof. Barnard is exploring with his powerful instrument, is the region of the Milky Way, near the constellation of Sagittarius. This area of the heavens has never before been explored with such thoroughness. A few days ago, upon developing a plate taken with a long exposure, covering the region in Sagittarius, there was revealed in the lower left-hand corner a whitish cloud, with the edges sharply defined, and looking not unlike the gauzy wings of a fly, the dimensions, as projected on the plate, being about half by a third of an inch. This white blur, was a picture of a celestial object of inconceivable magnitude, and which, until that morning, no mortal eye had beheld. It was a hitherto unknown nebula. The nebula is so remote from our system, that no accurate estimate of its area can be made. There is little doubt, that a thousand solar systems such as ours could be contained in it. What an idea that fact gives us of the infinity of the universe and of the majesty of God.

He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names (Ps. 147: 4).

Stole a Gold Bar

A confession was made by a boy arrested in Buffalo, N. Y., last week, of the theft of an ingot of gold from a jewelry firm in New York. He had been in the employ of the firm, and when the bar was missed, suspicion fell on him. He managed to get away before he was arrested. The gold was worth twelve hundred dollars, and it was still in his possession. Asked why he had stolen it, he said: "I was tired of working for almost nothing, and I thought I would get the money on this, and I couldn't see any way to start in life except on a game of this kind, and I took a chance at it." His chance failed him; but if it had succeeded, the stolen money would have been a bad foundation for the fortune he coveted. The prophet warns all men against such hopes:

Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong (Jer. 22: 13).

BRIEF NOTES

The American Baptist Missionary Union is raising a fund of half a million dollars for educational work in heathen lands. Dr. William Ashmore, the eminent missionary to China, now in his eighty-first year, has given $10,000 toward it.

Mr. Ralph Voorhees of Clinton, N. J., whose many large benefactions for religious, educational and charitable objects are widely known, has just donated one hundred thousand dollars for the general uses and purposes of the American Tract Society.

At the conclusion of the London revival, Mr. Torrey said that over 5,500 persons of all classes and creeds had publicly announced their conversion, while thousands of others had privately acknowledged conversion and changed their mode of living. After a short rest the revivalists will go to Germany for a series of meetings, afterwards returning to England.

FROM SACRAMENT TO SERVICE

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

THE saying that "the orbit of the Christian should be from prayer to work and from work to prayer" is well illustrated in the Lord's Supper, between whose courses came the episode of service, the washing of the disciples' feet by the Master. Let us study the whole story that we may see how the whole man should participate in Christian sacraments and service. The following was the Passover programme.

1. First cup of the fruit of the vine and blessing: "Blessed art thou, Jehovah, our God, who hast created the fruit of the vine! Blessed art thou, Jehovah, our God, King of the Universe, who hast chosen us from among all people," etc. (Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull calls attention to the fact that "wine" is never named as part of the Lord's Supper but only "fruit of the vine," doubtless newly pressed out to accompany unleavened bread.

2. Washing of hands. (It was here that Jesus washed his disciples' feet.)

3. Eating of the bitter herbs. The Master dipped them in salt water, ate of them and gave to others.

4. Second cup of the fruit of the vine filled. Instruction given concerning the Passover. A son asks his father, "Why is this night distinguished from all other nights?" The father replies, giving him the Jewish history from the time of the going out of Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees to the deliverance from Egypt under Moses.

5. The Passover lamb, bitter herbs, and unleavened bread brought to the table, and each explained.

6. First part of Hallel sung: Ps. 113 and 114.

7. Second cup of the fruit of the vine drunk.

8. Hands washed, bread broken and thanks given.

9. Master of the feast dips broken bread in the "Charoseth," a compound of dates, raisins and vinegar, and passes it to each in the company. (It was here that Jesus gave the "sop to Judas" who afterwards passed out).

10. The Passover lamb eaten.

11. Grace after meat.

12. Washing of hands.

13. Eating of Aphikomon, the half of an unleavened cake set aside in the beginning of the supper. (It was here that Christ gave the broken bread of the Lord's Supper.)

14. Third cup of the fruit of the vine. Jesus used this cup in connection with the Lord's Supper: "This is my blood of the new testament." This was probably followed by the discourse of Jesus recorded in John, chapters 14 to 17.

15. Fourth cup of the fruit of the vine drunk.

16. Second part of the Hollel sung, Ps. 115-118. ("And when they had sung a hymn, they went out").

"PETER SAITH UNTO HIM, 'THOU SHALT NEVER WASH MY FEET'"

Illustration and Application

1. Memory's Part in the Lord's Supper. Memory was summoned to the Lord's Supper as a regular guest when it was made a memorial: "This do in remembrance of me." The world is full of monuments by which men have attempted to keep themselves, their deeds and other signal events in perpetual remembrance. "When this you see remember me," is the meaning of many a building, many an institution. And it is worth noting here that the best monument is not a useless stone in a graveyard, but something that touches the daily life of men, such as a fountain in a crowded city, or a library open to the poor, or an asylum to alleviate misery,—best of all, some institution to give children a fair start in life. Too many monuments seek to perpetuate selfish conqests, to recall the very things of which men ought to be ashamed, the sacrifice of others to their own ambition. When Jesus set up a monument it was not to recall his coronation on the Mount of Transfiguration; not a celebration of his great miracles wrought amid wondering crowds; but he singled out the story of the cross as the one chapter of his earthly life to be remembered above all else, a chapter seemingly of defeat and shame, to which at the Last Supper he was looking forward as "the hour for which he came into this world." One fourth of the total space of the Gospels is given to the one week about the cross.

Remember my self-sacrifice as the crowning glory of my life, in order to make self-sacrifice the crowning glory of your own—that is the supreme meaning of the Lord's Supper. And in the long run is not self-sacrifice rather than selfishness the thing we are gladdest to remember of ourselves, and especially of others? "Nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember." "A good time is one that don't go off with the having." And the "good time" we do not allow to "go off with the having," but call up again and again and again in memory, is not some selfish feast, some selfish triumph, but some unselfish act for others. See what Job recalls when affliction turns his eyes in upon the pictures hung on memory's wall (Job 29: 11-17). When the death of a friend sets memory to unrolling his history, the spots we hasten over and try to forget, are his selfish acts, and those we linger upon, are his most unselfish deeds. Especially is it true that history mostly forgets selfish men and selfish acts, and glorifies the most unselfish deeds of those who gave up ease or life itself in the defense of native land or faith, or for the good of others, such as the doctors and nurses who have died in fighting plagues and fevers. Crœsus is about the only rich man of ancient times whose name is generally known, but what an army of martyrs, prophets, patriots are household words in every home.

If we had no memories and others had none, and we were day flies of a passing moment of emotion, it might seem worth while to give selfish enjoyment, regardless of God's will and men's good, the full control of our lives. But since memory is eternal and God will often say, "Remember," in this world and the next, and since men also will remember what we do and say, good or bad, it is not worth while to do for the moment's pleasure, what will be bitter in memory forever. Even if repentance should bring us God's great promise, "Thy sins and iniquities will I remember no more," we cannot altogether forget the selfish, sinful hours. They shall come back like taunting ghosts, even in our sacramental hours of heart-searching to dim its joys. Blessed are they who in recalling Christ's self-sacrifice at the Lord's Supper, can feast also on the memories of lesser but real self sacrifices of their own!

In the chapel at Glenalmond School, in Perthshire, Scotland, there is a marble slab with a most stirring story: A former pupil, Alexander Cumine Russell, became an officer in the Seventy-fourth Highlanders when only a lad of seventeen, and in connection with the memorable loss of the Birkenhead he won for himself immortal glory. The troopship struck upon a rock; the soldiers were formed in ranks upon the deck to die; th women and children were being saved in boats. Russe was ordered into one of the boats to command it. H saw a sailor's form rise close to the boat and a har strive to grasp the side. A woman in the craft calle out in agony, "Save him! Oh, save him, sir; he is m husband!" But there was no room for another perso and the boat was laboring heavily as it was. Russe looked at that woman, then at her children, then at thos beseeching eyes in the deep, and, rising in the stern, h plunged into the water and helped that sailor into wha had been his own place. Then, amid a chorus of, "Go bless you!" from every one in the boat, the brave youn fellow sank in the deep. It is such acts that put highe honor on human life, and help us to understand th supreme self-sacrifice of him in whom manhood reach ed its perfect flower because of his life-long unselfishnes

2. The Will's Part in the Lord's Supper. But w must not leave Memory at the Lord's Supper as a solita ry guest of God, as is so often done, devoting the whol service to recollection of the past. We call it a "sacra ment," which should remind us it has to do intensel with the present and with the will, for the sacramentu was the Roman soldiers' oath of loyalty to his emperor Baptism is our initiatory sacramentum of enlistment, th Lord's Supper, a renewal of that oath of loyalty. W are indeed Christian soldiers, and going to meetings i but going to headquarters for enlistment and oath o loyalty and orders and ra tions, with a view to goin forth to real battles agains evils in us and about us Both sacraments should sound the militant note, s much needed:

Onward, Christian soldiers marching as to war.
With the cross of Jesus going o before.

Let the Sunday School teach that courage can b shown in saving men's live quite as much as in destroy ing them, that "peace hath her victories not less renown ed than war." During a epidemic of black cholera a physician saw a soldier com ing from a quarantine house. He hastened to him stopped him where he was told him his condition—tha he had the disease already and that the next day h would be unconscious. H bade him remain until help was found. The condition was told the nearest regiment, and a volunteer wa asked to care for the man. "You may escape," said the physician, "but you will more likely die of the disease. Who will volunteer?" One man stepped out from the regiment. "I will go," said he. Now this man was named "The Coward of the Regiment," because of his well-known fear of physical danger, and he had run from many an engagement. But when his heroic act was seen, the regiment recognized his superior courage in another line than that of battle, and a simultaneous shout of approbation arose. "The Coward of the Regiment" cared for the stricken man, took the disease himself, and in three days died. A $5,000 monument was erected by the members of the regiment to the "coward" who could shame them all in heroism.

3. Affection's Part in the Lord's Supper. But the Lord's Supper is also called "the Communion," and this name summons the heart to the Lord's table. It is never really a "Communion" unless the heart is there. All Jewish altars pictured the Lord's table, and showed the way back to the lost fellowship of God and man. And the sacramental table includes all the Mosaic sacrifices in one.

It is a sin-offering in its bread and wine, symbols of the shed blood and wounded body of the Crucified. It is a whole burnt-offering in its oath of reconsecration. It is a peace-offering in that the forgiven worshiper is welcomed to the very table of God to eat with him in the second friendship of completed atonement—at-one-ment. We shall presently see it is also a thank-offering. Nothing is more essential to a true "Communion" than that heart-fellowship of Christ and the Christian which is expressed in the story of the "Last Supper" when it is said of Jesus that "having loved his own he loved them unto the end." Religion ever tends to fossilize, and we need ever to keep in mind that it is not a form but a fellowship.

The Gladness of Easter-Tide

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

EASTER'S MESSAGE

EASTER brings a gladness greater than that of any other season. It is the triumph and coronation of the Christian's hope.

It comes to the sick room with a message of ıeer. Long and dreary are the hours of pain, but health ıllows illness, and convalescence is the outcome of conıered fever, and —you are going to get well. Why, you have held your own through the season of ice and ıow, of course you are going to get well and strong ›w that Easter is here. The flowers say this to the valid, as they bring their message, spelled in bloom, ıd diffused in fragrance, and make bright her room, 'ıd the birds sing it outside her window, and the brooks ıince along playing the same merry tune for her delight, ıd the south wind steals in through the open casement ıd fans her cheek, whispering, "Be strong and of good ›urage. Easter Day is here once more."

Easter has its symbolism of hope for the discouraged. he world is never without its disheartened people, ıose who have been left behind in the race, who have ied and failed, who have known the bitterness of asted effort and the sorrow of hope deferred. But ıe whole atmosphere of Easter-tide throbs with such adness that the most depressed and morbid are fain to ıst oft the fetters that bind them, emerge from their oom, step out of the fog and rejoice in the sunlight.

Easter has its tocsin for youth. An inspiration to be ıd do our best takes hold of us when we are young 'ıd gay and light of heart and at the commencement of ie career. Let not him that putteth on the harness ›ast himself as he that putteth it off, but nevertheless ›uth should be buoyant and challenge defeat and ke no thought of obstacles. With elan and impetuıs action and freedom from fear, let youth and springme attack whatever opposes, and win the victory.

Easter brings comfort to the mourner. The house›ld of the sorrowing is always recruited by the newly ereaved. In our homes there are vacant chairs. But vacant chair here means another harp yonder. A nely home here means a mansion in heaven, all lightıl and shining. There, from sin and sorrow forever ee, is—

The song of them that triumph,
The shout of them that feast.

adiant, rapturous, glorious, beauful Easter, that reminds us again ıat Christ has trampled death unır his foot, that life is eternally enewed, that earth is passing, but eaven is abiding.

Not in the tomb do we find our ord. He is not here; he is risen. Ie is walking among the lilies in ıe garden, and as we walk there, e may hear him call us, as he alled Mary, by our name. And s we hear him, a new life shall be urs, a new sweetness, a new trength, a new satisfaction and ullness of content. For old things re passed away. Behold, all hings have become new!

Friends Estranged or Indifferent

They are short-sighted who leem that the worst thing that an overtake a friendship is that ne of the parties to it should die. Death is not the most terrible vent that can come to love. Far nore sorrowful is estrangement. Last year, two years ago, five ears ago, you had a friend. Your egard for her or for him was flawless. You had the most entire onfidence in his or her kindness, orbearance, and patience. You would not have been more surprised to have the sky fall than o have coldness succeed enthusiasm, apathy replace regard, and indifference follow cordiality. Yet you have experienced these. You may be to blame. When a friendship is blighted, somebody is responsible. But whoever is to blame, a beautiful thing has been slain, and love lies bleeding.

TRYING ON MAMMA'S EASTER BONNET

Hearts are not playthings. Life is very short. If thy brother, or thy friend, thy wife, thy husband, thy comrade, have offended, give him or her a chance to make reparation. Pour out forgiveness freely, not grudgingly, but lavishly as the rain falls from the April skies.

Or else, God help thee, a day will come when the despairing cry of thy soul will be, "Too late, too late!"

There may be an Easter-tide for a withered friendship. Do not shut eyes and ears to its sweet pleading.

MAKING EASTER HATS IN A NEW YORK MILLINERY WORKROOM

—A. E. J. R. A man is certainly prudent in hesitating about entering matrimony until he has a sufficient income. But it has been proved over and over that a thrifty wife will enable a man to save more money than he did in his days of single blessedness. Many men who hesitate to marry would be able to do so if they would give up indulgences which eat into their salaries.

THE EASTER BONNET

NOT merely fashion impels us to don something bright, fresh and gay when Easter finally rings the knell of winter. You may smile, but a woman's bonnet is, in a sense, a queen's diadem. The prettiest costume in the world is spoiled, its effect is ruined, by a dowdy, unbecoming, ill-matched hat or bonnet. Many a husband, if he knew the truth, would be surprised to learn that he owes his present and his life-long happiness to the fact that on a certain day, years ago, Martha was wearing a hat that was trimmed with a wreath of roses, or a bonnet with blue ribbons that somehow set off the wonderful blue of her eyes. He did not fall in love with the hat, but he might not have noticed the wearer, had she been quenched under a frumpy bit of headgear. The Easter bonnet comes out in time to parade in the procession of the flowers. You and I are taking a walk down the street and we stop, being women, to look in at the windows. Which windows? Why, at the florists', to be sure, and at the milliners'. A milliner's window is first cousin to a florist's, and very nearly as fascinating.

On the Easter bonnet there should be leaves, and rosebuds, any flowers you please, velvet, lace and ribbons, but never a wing, a plume, nor a dead bird. Not so much as the manufactured semblance of a dead bird is fit for a lady's hat. The suggestion of death jars. It strikes a false note amid the silvern melody. It makes a woman near of kin to the savage. It is never in good taste, and should go once and for all out of fashion.

Flowers and Easter

White flowers, azaleas, lilacs, roses, carnations, ascension lilies, hyacinths, and lilies of the valley, should predominate in Easter decorations, because of their chaste purity. Palms and ferns, and all exquisite greenery form a background for the pure white flowers. but the deeper hues need not be excluded, if one wishes to mingle deep pink or faint purple, or any other tint with the white bloom. Only let the white flowers form the masses, and use the yellow, the blue, or the red very sparingly, at intervals, or as a fringe. Everything used at Easter should convey an idea of spotless and unimpaired beauty, as well as of delicate perfume.

AN EASTER SONG

IN the darkness and the silence
The bulb lay sleeping long,
To waken when the birds returned,
And earth was blithe with song.
To lift a spike of fragrant bloom
For tired eyes to see,
To touch again with vital breath
The chords of memory.

Life holds high festival to-day
Triumphant over death;
Exalts us, creatures of a span,
Of faint and failing breath,
To that high place, where evermore
The reign of death is past,
Where never more is fear or dread,
The last fight won, at last!

And Christ, the Victor, lead his own
To pastures, green and fair,
What joy of joy before us, when
That land with Christ we share.
It is the radiant Easter-tide,
It is the feast of love;
For Jesus, who was crucified,
Has risen, and reigns above. M.E.S.

An Easter Party

If there are children in the household, Easter should not pass without their having a festival. A party that is a real merrymaking is their privilege. The right time for it is Easter Monday, and a great deal of fun may be made by hiding Easter presents everywhere—under cushions, in nooks and corners upstairs and down, and letting the children hunt for them. Threads may furnish a clue, but the threads should lead about in involved and mysterious ways, not straight to the goal. Colored eggs are appropriate, and the refreshments should include, if practicable, a nest of spun sugar filled with eggs of ice-cream.

He Humbled Himself

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE days were rapidly passing which led up to that central fact of the world's history when Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God, suffered death at the hands of those for whom that very death was suffered, to redeem them from eternal death. His last public testimony had been spoken in the temple, and his last works of mercy had been done, when the blind and the lame had come to him in the temple; and he healed them. But though he had done so many miracles before them—even the raising of Lazarus—yet they believed not on him, that Isaiah 6: 9, 10 might be fulfilled. They had wilfully closed their eyes to the light. The Lord Jesus, quoting the same passage, had said of them, "Their eyes they have closed" (Matt. 13: 15). But now things had gone farther; they who had then closed their eyes, had now lost the power to believe! "They could not believe." They who will not see Jesus when they have the opportunity, may finally lose the power to believe in him. It is an awful thing to trifle with conviction.

Meanwhile, the Lord Jesus, having partaken of that last memorable supper with his disciples in the family circle at Bethany, where Mary had anointed him, now keeps the Passover with his disciples only. The dissentient voice of Judas had been heard at the supper in Bethany; he would go out from the number of the disciples at the Passover feast. "Now, before the feast of the Passover, Jesus, knowing that his hour was come, that he should depart out of this world unto the Father, having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end" (John 13: 1). Much would happen that night which would have shaken any other love; but the love of Jesus is divine, and therefore infinite and illimitable. He never loves us for what we are, but for his own purpose, which he will accomplish in us. He knows the end from the beginning, and knows that "He shall see of the travail of his soul" in us and be satisfied. Neither the denial of Peter nor his abandonment by the remaining ten, altered one iota the eternal love with which Jesus loved his own. And this is the love, the utterly undeserved love, with which he loves you and me.

"And during supper, the devil, having already put into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray him, Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he came forth from God, and goeth unto God, riseth from supper." He had yet one important thing to do before he left that company for Gethsemane, the judgment hall and the cross. Before him he saw the anticipated return to his Father, and he knew that it would be as the Victor that he, the God-man, should ascend up where he was before, taking his human body with him, triumphant over sin and death and the grave. The ambition of his love for man was to personally represent man at the throne of God as the proved Conqueror.

What was then the important matter which he had now in hand? To do the service of a slave to his disciples! At the table they had been striving which should be the greatest (Luke 22: 24). How, then, could men with such a spirit volunteer to take the slave's place? And who could represent him to a lost world who could not thus humble himself? Only one of the company was empty enough of self to do it; and it was Jesus.

HIS FIRST LOVE

HIS first love? Yes, I knew her very well.
Yes, she was young and beautiful like you,
With cheeks rose-flushed, and lovely eyes that fell
If people praised her overmuch, but true
And fearless, flashing out as blue eyes can,
At any cruelty to beast or man.

Her voice? 'Twas very gentle, sweet and low,
With tones to hush a tired child to sleep;
In every cadence clear, its silvery flow
Beside a sick-bed had a charm so deep
Its spell could banish creeping waves of pain,
Bring easeful quiet to the fevered brain.

Her hands? Well, they were not quite so small
As those that trifle with your dainty laces;
A little browned, perhaps, they had such call
To carry sunshine into shady places;
Less delicate than yours, and yet I doubt
If one who loved her ever found it out.

Her feet? Sure never steps so sure and steady
Went straight as arrow flying to a goal;
If duty summoned her, the ever ready
To minister to any ailing soul.
Dear feet that followed where the Master led,
And set their prints where first He'd left his tread.

His first love? Oh, you do begin to see
That he might love her dearly, and that yet
His manhood's love to you might guerdon be,
Upon your woman's brow, its coronet.
Dear girl, accept the gift. There is no other
First love so holy as she gained—his mother. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Prayer for Missions*

MANY persons ask w prayer should be offer for blessings that w might expect that God wou grant without being importune
Why, for example, pray that will bless missions domestic a foreign? The answer is that desires to be "inquired of f these things." Prayer is nev to be regarded as an attempt persuade God to do somethi that he is not willing to do.
is the expression of a desir which is never so likely to granted as when it is unselfi and is in harmony with his ow will. The Christian sympathiz with God's purposes for the sa vation of the world and asks h blessing on the efforts b e i n made for that end. We a workers together with him
this stupendous task in which is engaged, of bringing the who human race into willing obed ence to him. Having deliberat ly chosen evil, men are to lear how mistaken is their choice, an of their own accord, aided by h
Spirit, are to turn to him an acknowledge their blunder an give themselves to him. That the grand climax of all the relig ious work that is being done.
is right, therefore, that we pray
Hasten the time when all sha know thee from the least unt the greatest; for to know thee i life and peace.

Why, then, is there need o prayer, if our desires are in har mony with his? Will he no carry out his designs without ou prayers? We might a s k th same question about our work
Would it not be possible for hin to convert the world without ou efforts? Doubtless it would, bu he has committed the task to hi people, and has given them th honor and privilege of workin with him to the same end. Hov important then is the need o prayer for guidance. In ou short-sightedness we may devis plans that would retard or im pede the success we desire. Tim and again mistakes have beer made and we have but to retrac our steps. We need wisdom, which God gives to those wh
ask it. Our energies and th energies of the workers flag and there is need to ask for a quick ening. Our spirits sink and we plead for encouragement. Con tributions are lacking and we ask God to impart a liberal spirit to his people. Above all, we need to pray that we may never lose sight of our dependence on God. For these and many other blessings prayer is necessary.
Even Christ, equipped with om nipotent power for his work on earth, employed this aid. His example should put an end forever to all questions of the utility of prayer. He knew its value and assured us that it would be answered if it was offered in faith.

It is a stupendous task that is intrusted to the church. It is not only to make the glad news of salvation known to all nations, but to contend with prejudice, and with the opposition of men whose interests would be imperilled by the acceptance of the Gospel. Superstition, ignorance, malevolence, are all opposed to the work of missions and many a life has been sacrificed in the work. Who is sufficient for these things? Only men who are strengthened and supported of God. That he will bless and help them, we should pray as we would pray for the soldier who goes forth to battle in defense of his native land. They represent the whole church in obedience to Christ's command. The least we can do is to pray for their success.

The Resurrection of Miss Cynthia

By FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Miss Cynthia Day had been for years under the ntrol of rigid and harsh grandparents, as well a severe mother. All the natural inclinations girlhood had been suppressed. After the death her relatives, she continues the same narrow istence, economizing from habit, and ably as-ted in this by the old servant, Abby Whiton. oubled by a pain in her chest she visits a doc-r, who shocks her with the announcement at she has only a year to live. Her whole soul bels against the thought of death. She meets e Puffer twins, and she joins them in her first n down hill, and also accepts an invitation to eir picnic, much to Abby Whiton's annoyance.

CHAPTER III.—Continued

MISS CYNTHIA sank tremulously down upon a particularly damp and mouldering log, which one of the twins ointed out. It was so delightful to merely rest that she drew eep breaths of satisfaction. Presently she recalled the act that a meeting of the Executive Committee of The Ladies' Aid and Missionary ociety had been appointed t her house that afternoon. Consulting her watch, she ound that it would be impossible to reach home in ime to receive the committee. She reviewed the correlated facts with dreamy ndifference. Abby Whiton would open the door, she new. She would, in all robability, tell the committee about the Puffer twins igging up the daffodils; lso, she would describe in letail the preparations for he picnic, concluding with spirited account of her own ubsequent industries and nxieties. Abby Whiton was uite as well known and respected in the community s any one of the matrons who formed the committee, ence her account of the ingular doings of Miss 'ynthia would merit, and eceive, the gravest consideration.

Miss Cynthia contemplated, as in a vision, the solemn consternation of Mrs. Buckthorn, and the wondering astonishment of the others. It did not appear to her as at all important.

She presently forgot the meeting altogether, as she rose uncertainly to her feet and strolled away from the neighborhood of the damp log, leaving the little splint basket behind her.

The remark of Mrs. Puffer, as truthfully reported by the twins, recurred to her mind. "I never thought much about giving my things away," she said to herself. "We never gave things away at our house. Grandmother Breyfogle used to say it wasn't so much charity with most folks as it was pure laziness. She said it was easier to pack a lot of stuff off onto other shiftless folks than it was to take care of it. But there is no use for me to keep things now. I may as well give everything away."

Unconsciously she had walked faster and faster as she pursued this course of reminiscent reasoning. Having arrived at its simple conclusion, she stopped short and looked about her. The open pasture had gradually given place to a thick, solemn-looking wood. Ground-pine and russet mosses, elastic and fragrant, stilled the sound of her little feet. There was a subtle, alluring sweetness abroad mingling with the spicy breath of the trees. Miss Cynthia's short-sighted blue eyes wandered hopefully to a steep bank, covered with brown leaves and the discarded needles of the great pine trees which stood guardian above it. Once, a long time ago, she had run away from school on an April day—with the boy. And on a bank like this—her eager fingers stirred the withered leaves—they had found—Oh, the young rapture of it!

The wild fragrance swept her faded cheek like a caress. She cried aloud with the ecstasy of her discovery. Arbutus, pink and white like a baby's palm, folded close in rosy buds, opened wide like white stars. Her sombre little world disappeared in a rose-tinted mist of happiness—pain, disappointment, loneliness, the long shadow of approaching death—all was forgotten in the delightful, the satisfying vision of the moment.

And always just beyond stretched another starry slope, or a bank yielding pinker and more odorous buds. She bound the flowers into great bunches, and swung them upon her arm that her hands might be empty for more. Then the gentle madness passed, and by slow degrees she realized that the bright afternoon light had faded, and that a lonely little wind presaging rain, was beginning to cry among the tree-tops.

Miss Cynthia called aloud upon the Puffer twins in a shrill, frightened voice; then she hurried through a rough pasture, leaving bits of her black gown on the clutching briars, only to find her way barred by an unfamiliar stone wall.

On the further side of the road was a narrow and very muddy road, which seemed to Miss Cynthia's tired eyes to stretch away up to the lonely sky in one direction, and to lose itself in a gloomy wood at the other. She weakly ventured herself upon the stone wall, but the stones slipped uncertainly beneath her tired feet. Then she sat down, and wept large, childish tears of pure fright and fatigue.

"THE PUFFER TWINS WERE SWINGING UPON THEIR OWN GATE WHEN GEORGE BLOSSOM DREW UP"

CHAPTER IV.

THE melancholy procedure of shedding tears is frequently followed by a definite and cheerful reaction. This, doubtless, accounts for the fact that many persons of a weak and lymphatic disposition are prone to indulge in what has been aptly termed "the luxury of grief." Miss Cynthia, after crying helplessly for perhaps five minutes, again addressed herself to the task of surmounting the stone wall. This time she succeeded, and landed on the other side, breathless and tremulous with her unwonted exertions.

The intermittent creak and rattle of wagon-wheels reached her anxious ears from beyond the brow of the hill. Presently the wagon itself hove into view. The single brown horse which drew it pounded heavily down the long, muddy slope, his course being controlled by a ruddy-cheeked young man in blue overalls, who sat on the high seat. A long step-ladder protruded from the back of the vehicle, and an alert-looking collie trotted briskly at the wheel.

Miss Cynthia instinctively clutched at the friendly wall. She ardently wished that she had not climbed over, it now seemed impossible to climb back; besides, the alert collie had already spied her. He dashed forward with loud, excited barkings. Miss Cynthia screamed. She was very much afraid of dogs, and this particular dog was spattered with mud to the tip of his curly tail. "Go away!" she cried weakly. "Oh, what shall I do! Go away!" The muddy dog had planted a proprietory paw on the skirt of her gown, and was snuffing his find with a doggish grin of satisfaction.

The young man drew up his clumsy horse, with a loud "Whoa! Here, Rover, you rascal! Down, sir, down!" he commanded. "He won't hurt you, ma'am," he added, staring curiously at the shrinking little figure flattened thinly against the stone wall.

"I—I've lost my way, I think," said Miss Cynthia, striving vainly to regain her vanished dignity. Fresh tears clouded her blue eyes, and she was obliged to wink fast to keep them from falling down her cheeks. She was in the habit of distrusting strange men quite as deeply as she did dogs.

This particular young man was looking at her very kindly and reassuringly, out of a pair of honest gray eyes; as for the muddy collie, he had retreated to a position behind his master, and was also eyeing her in a specuulative, but entirely friendly manner.

"I think I know you," said the young man, in his pleasant, deep voice. "You are Miss Day, of Innisfield. My name is George Blossom; I'm sorry to say I've frequently stolen apples off the sweeting tree back of your barn, when I was a boy. How good they were, to be sure, and how indignant the tall woman in a purple calico gown used to be when she caught us, which wasn't often."

"I suppose you mean Abby Whiton," said Miss Cynthia, in a depressed voice. "She's nearly always indignant about something. How—how far is it to Innisfield, and which way must I go to get there?"

"It's a matter of three miles to the village, Miss Day," the young man told her, "I'm going home myself, and if you won't mind riding in my wagon I shall be glad to take you. It will be easier than walking, anyway."

"I haven't any idea where the twins can be," sighed Miss Cynthia, "they may be looking for me." Then seeing the puzzled look in the young man's eyes, she entered into an explanation of some length concerning the picnic, and the wintergreen hunt, and of how the little splint basket, containing three red apples and six slices of bread and butter, had been left by the log. "I forgot how late it was growing after I found the arbutus," she finished. "I haven't seen any before in years."

The puzzled look had only deepened as she went on with her halting little story. But the young man laughed outright when she mentioned the Puffer twins. "I'll risk Ed and Harry Puffer in any part of the country," he said. "They'll probably go straight home after they've eaten up everything in the basket. You'd better get right in with me and go to the village; we'll stop at the Puffers' on the way and see if the children have come."

He lifted Miss Cynthia to the high seat of the wagon, and they were presently rattling down the muddy road behind the big, brown horse, at what seemed a reckless rate of speed.

"I've just finished a job," observed George Blossom, by way of making conversation. He jerked his thumb over his shoulder in an explanatory manner which seemed to include the long step-ladder and a half dozen of sticky pails which danced noisily on the unsteady bed of the wagon. "I'm a painter and paper-hanger by trade," he went on, with a scowl which looked decidedly out of place on his ruddy, good-humored face.

Miss Cynthia had surreptitiously attached herself with barnacle-like firmness to the low rail which surrounded the wagon-seat on one side, and to George Blossom's coat on the other. She was really afraid she might fall off in some mad, unexpected plunge of the stolid, brown horse; and this fear of the animal had in great degree lessened her apprehension of the man who drove it. "Don't you—think we—we're going pretty fast?" she faltered, as the wagon wheel lurched violently over a stone.

"Why, perhaps we are," said George Blossom, pulling his horse to a walk and glancing quizzically down at the small, scared face by his side. "You aren't used to driving, I reckon?"

"Not—not exactly. I've ridden in carriages, though, a good deal to—to funerals. That seems different, you know; you can't see the horses for one thing; and they generally go nice and slow."

"Yes, I guess it is quite different," agreed the young fellow soberly, then his eyes twinkled. "You've got a big house, Miss Day; did you ever think how scrumptious it would look if you had it all painted up outside?—say a light steel gray; or white, with a green trim and green blinds; then for inside work, I've got paper that can't be beat; white grounds with roses running all over 'em as natural as life, or floral stripes, or bunches of different sorts of posies tied with pink an' blue ribbons—oh, they're great! I wish you'd give me the job of fixing up your place."

"I never thought of doing anything to the house," said Miss Cynthia meditatively, "it's always looked just as it does now since I can remember. Grandfather Breyfogle had it papered when he was married. The papers were all very nice and expensive; that on the parlor walls cost four dollars a roll. It was imported from England."

The young man whistled. "I'll bet I could put you up something twice as pretty for—say seventy-five cents," he hazarded. "You want white paint rubbed down to an ivory finish for those old-fashioned rooms, and something light and handsome for the side walls. I've just been doing up Mrs. Scott's parlor and dining-room—the parlor in kind of a soft, dull green, and the dining-room in blue and white. Then I did Miss Rosalie's rooms. Gracious, if they ain't pretty! I wish you could see them!"

"I remember Rosalie Scott," said Miss Cynthia, with a reminiscent frown; "she always used to giggle out loud in sermon time. Once I gave her a head of caraway, and she pulled it to pieces and stuck the seeds all over Deacon Scrimger's coat in a sort of pattern. Her mother never once looked that way, though I should think she'd have expected 'most anything of Rosalie."

The young man threw back his head and laughed heartily. "I guess Mrs. Scott didn't want to bother Miss Rosalie as long as she was quiet," he said. "She was a regular mischief when she was little. She's come back from boarding-school now, to stay; and she—she's just beautiful!"

The young man's tone was so earnest and heartfelt that Miss Cynthia felt a sympathetic thrill. "I'd like to see her," she said, almost eagerly. "What sort of paper did you put on her room, did you say?"

"Miss Rosalie's got two rooms now she's home for good," the young man told her, with a deep sigh. "I can show you samples of the papers if you'll just hold the lines while I get 'em; they're under the seat."

Miss Cynthia grasped the reins so firmly that her little hands trembled. She sat up very straight, and a pink spot burned in each sallow cheek. Mr. Blossom did not appear to notice her agitation. He got down off the seat, thrust one long exploring arm beneath it, and presently produced a bundle of small rolls of wall-paper, which he proceeded to spread out on his knee for Miss Cynthia's inspection.

"There, this one, with a kind of a cream-white ground and little wreaths of roses running all over it, is on her bedroom. I put white enamel paint on the woodwork, and she's got her grandmother's old mahogany furniture in there, and——"

The young man stopped short and looked at his companion curiously. Her blue eyes were fixed earnestly on the bobbing head of the brown horse; her lips were screwed up into a small, pink knot, not unlike one of the pale rosebuds on the white wall-paper. "Aren't you going to look at these papers, ma'am, now I've got 'em out?" he asked, in a disappointed voice.

"I don't see how I can and drive this horse," replied Miss Cynthia, in a tone of poignant distress. "Seems to me the harder I pull on the lines the faster he goes. Look—he's—running away!"

Mr. Blossom reached over and possessed himself of the reins, which he proceeded to hold negligently in his left hand, while he descanted at length on the beauty of the wall-papers and the elegance of the apartments in the Scott house. "If I could only get a few more jobs like that one may be I

HONEST CONFESSION

A Doctor's Talk on Food.

There are no fairer set of men on earth than the doctors, and when they find they have been in error, they are usually apt to make honest and manly confession of the fact.

A case in point is that of an eminent practitioner, one of the good old school, who lives in Texas. His plan, unvarnished tale needs no dressing up:

"I had always had an intense prejudice, which I can now see was unwarrantable and unreasonable, against all muchly advertised foods. Hence, I never read a line of the many 'ads.' of Grape-Nuts, nor tested the food till last winter.

"While in Corpus Christi for my health, and visiting my youngest son, who has four of the ruddiest, healthiest little boys I ever saw, I ate my first dish of Grape-Nuts food for supper with my little grandsons. I became exceedingly fond of it, and have eaten a package of it every week since, and find it a delicious, refreshing and strengthening food, leaving no ill effects whatever, causing no eructations (with which I was formerly much troubled), no sense of fullness, nausea, nor distress of stomach in any way.

"There is no other food that agrees with me so well, or sits as lightly or pleasantly upon my stomach as this does. I am stronger and more active since I began the use of Grape-Nuts than I have been for 10 years, and am no longer troubled with nausea and indigestion." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There's a reason.

could get somewhere in the world," he concluded, his frank face clouding like the inconstant April sky. "I've always wanted to study designing and inside decorating on a big scale. I could do it, I know I could, if I only had a chance. But I suppose I'll spend the balance of my days painting the village folks' picket-fences, and giving the farmers' barns an occasional coat of red paint, when they ain't too darned stingy to give me the job."

"I don't think," said Miss Cynthia, with the air of a person who consciously exerts an influence, "that you ought to say——. Well, I don't like to speak the word myself, because it means real bad swearing. I said it once when I was a little girl, and my mother snipped my tongue with a pair of sharp scissors. Of course she didn't really cut a piece off; but it made a sore place, and I always remember it when I hear that word."

"Jimminy! I should think you would!" agreed George Blossom, with a surprised whistle. "It seems to go mighty well with words likes stingy and mean, though," he added. "I'd kind of hate to give it up."

Miss Cynthia fixed her blue eyes upon the young man with an inquiring gaze. "Did you ever hear anyone say that I was stingy?" she asked distinctly.

Mr. Blossom blushed a beautiful, surprised-looking red, even his ears burned scarlet under the light brown curls of his hair. "I—I didn't mean ——" he began with evident distress, "I'm sure I——"

Miss Cynthia sighed. She was not a very astute little person, but she arrived at a rapid and correct conclusion for once. "I see that you have," she said regretfully. "Well, do you know I never thought very much about it—about being stingy, I mean, till—till yesterday. Yesterday I heard something—something very important to me. It—it somehow changed—everything. I think I've been very foolish to be so—so saving. I didn't really need to be economical, you know. And I've decided to give nearly everything in my house away. I shall not need it myself, and I'm sure I shall enjoy giving it away. It—it will be different."

Mr. Blossom was so antonished that he could hardly believe what his scarlet ears were telling him. The Breyfogle family were, in the estimation of their townspeople, an unalterable proposition. One could depend upon their stinginess quite as implicitly as on other folks' generosity. To be depended upon in any capacity is in itself praiseworthy; and nobody likes to have the fixed stars of his firmament turned incontinently into frisking comets. Mr. Blossom, therefore, upon hearing these surprising sentiments from the lips of Miss Cynthia Day, merely gave vent to a conservative whistle. He was one of those fortunate persons, usually of the sterner sex, who are able to express a large number of varied emotions in this entirely safe and non-committal manner.

"I can't think just how to begin," pursued Miss Cynthia earnestly. "I don't know who would like to have the things, in the first place."

The sagacious Mr. Blossom saw his opportunity and seized it with business-like promptness. "I think, ma'am," he said, very respectfully, "that one of the best ways to give things away that is, if you have too much of anything, money, for example is to give work to the people that need work, and pay them well for it. Some folks Jew you down so you can't make any sort of a profit. 'Live and let live' is a good enough motto for me."

"'Live, and let live,'" repeated Miss Cynthia thoughtfully. "What do you think that means?"

"Why, it's plain enough," said Mr. Blossom strongly. "You're living all right, ain't you? Got enough of everything and something to spare, if you've a mind to; but you've got to 'let' other folks live; and that means, I take it, that you ought to help 'em to live. If there's anything you want done that you can't do for yourself, hire somebody that can do it, and pay 'em for doing it good, fair money, so they can live, too. If everybody did that right along I guess there wouldn't be so much talk about labor unions and strikes, and all that sort of thing."

Miss Cynthia smiled vaguely. "I guess so, too," she said pleasantly. Then she sighed. "I wish it was true," she murmured.

"Wish what was true?"

"About living—if you let other folks live."

"Course it's true; who said it wasn't?"

"Sometimes—people die, you know, when—when they aren't very old, and when they don't want to die, either. How do you explain that?"

Mr. Blossom appeared slightly staggered by this metaphysical problem. "I can't explain everything that happens, of course," he said candidly. "But," he added firmly, "I know that 'Live and let live' 'll stand, as a general rule. I guess some folks could quote Scripture to back it up, too. I can't remember Bible verses for shucks; but there's something or other about getting the same sort of crops out of the ground that you put in. And that stands to reason and experience, too, doesn't it? If you put in potatoes, you don't expect to dig turnips. You could turn the saying 'round, if you wanted to, and it would sound just as well—may be better; 'Let live an' live.'"

Mr. Blossom looked modestly pleased with himself as he finished this pointed exposition. "Miss Rosalie's a great hand for arguing about 'most everything," he added irrelevantly. "Off an' on, we've had some regular debates on all sorts of subjects. She's as bright and smart as a new whip, Miss Rosalie is; only there ain't any sting in her as there is to the end of a good whip-lash. She's just sweet!"

The young man lapsed into a pleasant revery which Miss Cynthia did not disturb. She was considering in her own peculiarly slow, bewildered and timid way, some very astonishing ideas which George Blossom's simple remarks had suggested. But if Miss Cynthia's mental processes were sadly involved and clouded, her practical inferences were simple and to the point.

"If it will help you any to paint and paper my house, inside or out, or to paper it," she said with gentle dignity, "I shall be very happy to have it done. I shall think of what you have said. It has never occurred to me before; yet it seems very reasonable, and—yes—true. I'm afraid I haven't taken much pains to let people live, and that's why——"

She stopped short with a little quiver in her voice. "And that's why," she finished bravely, "I'm going to do quite differently—after this."

CHAPTER V.

THE Puffer twins were energetically swinging upon their own gate when George Blossom, with Miss Cynthia at his side, drew up before the house. "Here you are, youngsters," he called out heartily, "and here's Miss Day. Where do you s'pose I found her?"

The twins had promptly abandoned their athletic performance upon the gate in favor of similar strenuous endeavor at the back of the wagon. They precipitated themselves upon the person of the young man with every token of enthusiastic regard. "Did you bring us any apples?" they demanded.

"I shouldn't wonder," admitted Mr. Blossom joyously, "just look in my basket there; and findings is keepings."

"WHEN I WAS A GIRL"

I loved Bible stories and the Sermon on the Mount. The historical events which captured my imagination, were the battle of Bunker Hill and the Fourth of July. I read but few novels, and those mostly by stealth. I was taught that they were, the most of them, the works of the Evil One.

I had five brothers older than myself, and no sister near my own age. My companionship was with boys and girls. I do not know that the girls of to-day enjoy more than we did, though their education is of a wider scope.

MRS. J. ELLEN FOSTER,
Lawyer and Reformer.

"Most Women Who Have Risen, Were Unselfish in Their Work"

A great deal has been said and written regarding the "unwomanliness" of a public career for women. It is probable that some women have started out in their girlhood to devote themselves to what is popularly understood by a "career," but I think I have never met any such person. The women whom I know who have risen to fame, have invariably begun to paint or write or lecture from one of three reasons, all of them unselfish. First, in order to support themselves, or to help a father or husband whom they loved, but who had not the faculty of making money; second, to conquer grief; third, to earn money to give to some relative or friend, to whom the father or husband was not willing or not able to give.

I have seen many enthusiastic girls, who wanted to write or pursue some other kind of public work; but every one of these married young, and became entirely devoted to home and children. The women writers and speakers of middle age who are now most prominent in the public eye, are, in the majority of cases, affectionate wives, who wrote something at first in the hope of earning money to buy something for a husband, who was not willing to spend the money for himself.

KATE UPSON CLARK,
Novelist.

"We Were Taught Truth, Honesty, and Respect for Those in Authority"

I do not think that the girls of to-day have any better opportunities for enjoying themselves than had the girls of yesterday. But I do believe that the girls of to-day have more freedom in respect to the companionship of boys than had the girls of my girlhood. Our chief games were those played out-of-doors. In respect to athletic exercises and outdoor sports for girls, yes! I believe in them to a limited extent. All good sermons impressed me. You ask me what passage in the Bible impressed me most as a girl. I can only reply: all of the Bible.

The great man who most influenced me was Henry W. Longfellow. The historical event that made the profoundest impression on my mind was the Civil War. I am not a public character, never had a public career, yet I have received many pathetic, humorous and strange letters from utter strangers.

In conclusion, I may say that in my youth girls and boys were taught the importance of truth, honesty, obedience, and respect for those in authority over us. We were also taught the Bible.

MRS. THEODORE THOMAS,
Widow of the celebrated Orchestra Leader.

"The Home Life Was Considered of the First Importance"

My first playfellow was a boy, a pretty, gentle fellow named Frank, and I cannot recall any particular restrictions upon the companionship of boys. Partly, perhaps, because I was a solitary child. The place in which I lived for eleven and one-half years of my life was a complete and a joyful little paradise to me, with its garden, where I needed no one else. Girls of to-day are not, to my thinking, left enough alone to permit them to develop their imaginations and their individuality. Still, it may be better, as poetry and sentiment have very little room in the twentieth century.

While all sorts of healthful games used up the exuberance of spirits of the girls, still the home life, with its regulations and duties, was considered to be of the first importance. Church attendance was deemed of the utmost importance. I was at an early age brought up a Unitarian, and as the belief was at odds with the Presbyterians, I thought a great deal about sermons which handled questions of devotion. At the age of eleven I attended the Episcopal Church, and came to love the ritual, which I love to this day. My home life was that of a large household, with much entertaining of visitors and a great deal of music.

Although I have written a great deal, and have many of the best rewards of a novelist, still I have kept to the quiet side of life and have appeared little in public. I wrote naturally from a longing to express my feelings for the beauty and mystery of human life.

"My Dearest Playmate Was My Father," Says Beatrice Harraden

Miss Beatrice Harraden, in interviews with our representative, Mr. Gilson Willets, both in New York and London, said: "I was educated in Dresden, Germany, and in colleges in England. I am a B. A. of the London University. My chief re creations now as always, are music and traveling.

"My dearest playmate as a girl was my father. He was the only other literary member of my family, and when I began to write, was my sternest critic. He traveled everywhere with me, except to America.

"I wrote miles and miles of stories anonymously for the newspapers, before I produced anything really successful. I submitted story after story to Blackwood's Magazine, but they were all failures. Mr. Blackwood persisted, however, that I should try again, till I wrote something that he liked. Hence I finally produced Ships That Pass In The Night.

"The words forming the title of that book are from Longfellow. A friend gave me the words long before I wrote the book. When the book came out, I was flooded with letters, asking where, in Longfellow, those words could be found. They are in Tales Of A Wayside Inn, in the fourth part; the third evening, the Theologian's second tale, called Elizabeth.

"In more extended form the lines run:

"Only a look, a voice, then darkness again,
Like ships that pass in the night
And speak each other in passing."

"We Girls Made the Most of What We Had and Were Content"

"When I was a girl" I was not restricted at all, except in the matter of dancing and cards. I was brought up in the orthodox belief of the times, that fashionable amusements were wicked. For the rest, I was as free as air.

Until I was twelve or thirteen, I went to a district school where there were as many boys as girls, and we should have missed them if they had not been there. We played with the boys and walked with them and teased them, and were teased by them. We associated with them as freely as with our brothers, with no thought of anything wrong.

As to enjoying ourselves, I do not think we had so many opportunities to do so as the girls of to-day. There were not so many lectures and concerts and entertainments; but we made the most of what we had and were content.

Going to church and Sunday School was not imposed upon me as a necessity. I was taught to think I ought to go, and went as a matter of course. The sermons were rather long, with "fourthlies" and "fifthlies," which were hard to follow.

JAP-A-LAC
"WEARS LIKE IRON"

WHAT JAP-A-LAC IS

When we first advertised Jap-a-Lac six years ago, we expended $1,500 during an entire year. The advertising we are doing in this month's magazines will cost us, approximately, $40,000.

The expenditure has grown because we have induced a large number of women to try Jap-a-Lac, and whenever it is once used we have secured a permanent customer.

There is hardly a room in any house in America that would not be better for a little Jap-a-Lac.

A chair you consider worthless, plus twenty-five cents' worth of Jap-a-Lac, will give you a piece of furniture that looks twenty-five dollars' worth.

Dead Black Jap-a-Lac will make a fine Flemish dining-room out of an extremely ordinary oak furnished room. Either Black or White Jap-a-Lac will make new and handsome the picture frame that you are quite ready to throw away.

The old table, desk, or book-case, that you think is fit only for kindling, simply because the varnish is scuffed, or because the color is not to your liking, can be brought back practically to its original new value with 25 cents' worth of Jap-a-Lac.

People who get interested in Jap-a-Lac are pretty likely to have beautifully enameled bedsteads instead of old, marred iron ones.

Gloss White or Dead Black Jap-a-Lac is used on iron fences, radiators, registers, water pipes, and hot water tanks. Dead Black Jap-a-Lac, applied to a tarnished chandelier or gas fixture gives it a finish closely resembling the popular black wrought iron.

Most of the Jap-a-Lac that is used is used by women. An intelligent child ten years old will have no trouble with it, and will take pleasure and gain knowledge in using it.

The colors of Jap-a-Lac are twelve:

Walnut	Malachite Green	Brilliant Black
Oak	Blue	Flat White
Mahogany	Ox-Blood	Gloss White
Cherry	Dead Black	Ground

Besides these, there is Natural or Clear Jap-a-Lac.

We will gladly give you a full size quarter-pint can if you will pay the cost of mailing. Send us ten cents, and the name of your dealer, and we will mail free, to any point in the United States, a sample can of any color you select.

Upon request, we will gladly send an interesting booklet about Jap-a-Lac, and a color card showing the different shades. To expedite reply, please address:

"WHEN I WAS A GIRL"

As to choosing my career, I think it me without choosing. I wrote because could not help writing. Once when a ry young girl, my companions were tell- g what they would do when they grew . I said I should write a book. They ughed at me, and insisted that I should ite it and they would read it. I did ite it, and they have read it. In my e as a writer, I have had, of course, me peculiar experiences. The worst of ese is having several doubles, whose oks pass for mine.

MARY J. HOLMES,
Author of Many Popular Books for Girls.

Girls of To-Day Are Much Taller Than When I Was a Girl"

I never spent a day in school. I was ought up on a Southern plantation by y father, who spoke with fluency all the atin tongues. Thus at thirteen, I spoke any languages, in fact, we were taught at we might speak any language except nglish in our home circle.

The girls of to-day are much taller, bet- r formed, more ruddy and robust than ey were twenty years ago, owing to eir open-air exercise, and athletic train- g. In fact, they are now quite like the nglish girls of a former generation. I as taken by my father, at the time I was x years of age, to a boys' gymnasium. uch excellent results were obtained that l through life I have exercised with dumb- lls and Indian clubs in my own rooms.

I never had toys of any kind, and was ld at four years of age that I must "be a ttle lady," and not laugh aloud. Books ere to me as companions, and I have -day the little golden locket which my other gave me on my fourth birthday as reward for having read a child's Bible rough. Probably the proudest moment my "public career" was when, after y husband's failure and death, and when e had appointed me in his will to "sit in s place and do his work" until those ebts were paid, that I carried in a little tchel the vouchers proving that the name f Frank Leslie was freed from every ob- gation.

MRS. FRANK LESLIE
(Baroness De Bazus)

I Believe the Out-door Girl Has Come to Stay"

In the few short years which have elaps- d since I was a girl (they at least seem w and short to me), I can see very little hange in the all-important relationship etween girls and boys. My own eighteen- ear-old daughter is quite as free as I was o choose her friends and to enjoy their ompanionship in her own home. I be- ieve, however, that the mothers of to-day re more conservative in the matter of llowing their daughters to be away from ome, unchaperoned, in the company of oung men. I believe also, that the col- ege-bred mother of the present century vill make a very careful study of the ocial relations between young people, vith the result that girls will not be permit- ed the untrammeled liberties of the past.

The amusements and recreations of girls re practically the same that I enjoyed at Wellesley College and elsewhere. In my pinion, the out-door girl has come to stay. She is a better student, a better wife, a better mother than the delicate, anæmic young person who accomplished endless "stints" in fine sewing, embroidery and "fancy work," but who frequently ex- hibited a hectic flush in her early twenties. I read everything I could lay hands upon in the large, mixed library of the country parsonage where most of my girlhood days were passed. A certain elderly relative was once shocked to find me reading Jane Eyre. "Do you see what that child is read- ing?" she demanded of my mother. But my mother, an enthusiastic admirer of the Brontes, only smiled. That novel stands out with extraordinary distinctness in my mind to this day. The small person of the indomitable Jane still appears to me like a veritable acquaintance.

Of historical events, the death of Garfield impressed me most. I remember that the fruitless prayers of the nation then appeared to me to lie like a great blot across some of the definite promises of the Bible. Afterward I came to see more clearly how a prayer may sometimes be most graciously answered in the denial of our specific request.

I have somehow never regarded my literary work in the light of a "public career." It is done so silently, in the quiet of the most secluded room in our secluded house, that happily for the worker it seems no more public than the daily work of other home-loving women. It is only when letters—humorous, sad, queer, and pathetic—reach me from the world without my study walls, that I realize that I am doing more than just spreading my own crowding thoughts on the big white sheets of paper which I love.

Recollections of a Childhood Passed in New Orleans

I was born in Connecticut, but when I was about three years old, business called my father to the city of New Orleans. My father's one thought was, that as he could not leave money to his children, he would give them the best education the city afforded. The best advantages were given only by the French schools; and we were sent to the most popular. French was the only language spoken in this school, and all our books were French books. For amusement we rode horseback, danced, or jumped the rope. As I recall what I saw and knew of slavery, in my younger life, it seems like a terrible dream. Every runaway slave who was caught, was put into the chained gang and made to clean the streets. Each man having a heavy iron ball chained to his leg. The runaway women had iron collars, with three prongs, put about their necks.

I can remember Sunday, only as a big holiday. My father had a pew in the Unitarian Church, and we went because it was respectable to do so. When I was sixteen, we moved to Brooklyn, and with all our Southern prejudice against abolitionists, my father took a pew in Beecher's church, as he admired his talents, although he did not at first agree with his strong views. As soon as I began to hear Mr. Beecher's sermons, I was deeply convicted of my false ideals of life. I shall never forget the suddenness of the revelation to me of a Christ, who could forgive and save us from sin. I united with the Church alone, but at the next communion my father and mother, brother, and two sisters, all joined me in my membership.

"I Am Thankful for My New England Christian Parentage"

I was graduated from the seminary founded by Catherine Beecher, in Hartford, Conn., but my preference is for co-education. I like girls and boys to be in the high schools and in colleges, which I think is a good preparation for the life they are to live together afterwards. A happy marriage is the best condition for both sexes. College education and enlarged fields of usefulness are doing great things for the women of the future.

I am thankful for my New England, Christian parentage. Probably I owe my devotion to the animal world—horses, dogs and cats—these many years, to being encouraged in my childhood to have many pets, a thing I did not forget in rearing my only son. A few of us in Ohio have fought for years, successfully, against any legislation that permits the killing of a dog or a cat because it is homeless, or because a tax or a license is not paid.

I was also taught to save time, a most valuable lesson for any young person to learn.

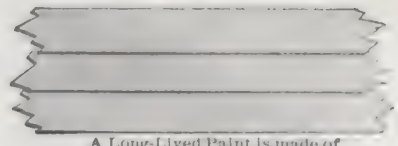
The Paint is Dead when the Oil is gone.



A Long-Lived Paint is made of Oil-Protecting Pigments.

When Is Paint Dead?

"Linseed Oil is the life of paint." When the oil departs, the paint is dead. Dead paint—a lustreless, dry, chalky coating—has no protective qualities, and disintegrates rapidly because the pigments have no cohesive attraction after the departure of the oil.

But the oil must be pure, and nothing should be added to the paint that will injure the oil and shorten its life. White Lead, used alone, "burns up" the oil, and the addition of an alkali, to unite the oil and water used in some paints, is equally disastrous. Paint containing water is, therefore, not good paint.

PATTON'S SUN PROOF PAINTS

Trade Mark Registered

Patton's Sun-Proof paints are long lived because they are made of the right materials—Zinc, Lead and Silica, Linseed Oil and Turpentine driers—in the right proportions, ground again and again by powerful machinery. Paints lacking any of these materials, or hand-mixed paints (a mere paddling together of the pigments and liquids), are short-lived—they chalk, crack, peel and blister, and, besides, lack beauty and covering capacity.

Our booklet, "Paint Queries," contains interesting information about paints, their colors and when and how to use them. Write for it.

WING PIANOS

ARE SOLD DIRECT FROM THE FACTORY, AND IN NO OTHER WAY

You SAVE from $75.00 to $200.00

When you buy a Wing Piano, you buy at wholesale. You pay the actual cost of making it with only our wholesale profit added. When you buy a piano, as many still do—at retail—you pay the retail dealer's store rent and other expenses. You pay his profit and the commission or salary of the agents or salesmen he employs—all these on top of what the dealer himself has to pay to the manufacturer. The retail profit on a piano is from $75 to $200. Isn't this worth saving?

SENT ON TRIAL

Anywhere WE PAY FREIGHT No Money in Advance

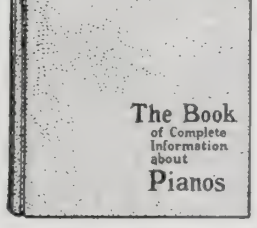
We will place a Wing Piano in any home in the United States on trial, without asking for any advance payment or deposit. We pay the freight and all other charges in advance. There is nothing to be paid either before the piano is sent or when it is received. If the piano is not satisfactory after 20 days' trial in your home, we take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing, and are under no more obligation to keep the piano than if you were examining it at our factory. There can be absolutely no risk or expense to you.

Do not imagine that it is impossible for us to do as we say. Our system is so perfect that we can without any trouble deliver a piano in the smallest town in any part of the United States just as easily as we can in New York City, and with absolutely no trouble or annoyance to you, and without anything being paid in advance or on arrival either for freight or any other expense. We take old pianos and organs in exchange. A guarantee for 12 years against any defect in tone, action, workmanship or material is given with every Wing Piano.

SMALL, EASY MONTHLY PAYMENTS

In 37 years over 40,000 Wing Pianos have been manufactured and sold. They are recommended by seven governors of States, by musical colleges and schools, by prominent orchestra leaders, music teachers and musicians. Thousands of these pianos are in your own State, some of them undoubtedly in your very neighborhood. Our catalogue contains names and addresses.

Mandolin, Guitar, Harp, Zither, Banjo—The tones of any or all of these instruments may be reproduced perfectly by any ordinary player on the piano by means of our Instrumental Attachment. This improvement is patented by us and cannot be had in any other piano. WING ORGANS are made with the same care and sold in the same way as Wing Pianos. Separate organ catalogue sent on request.



You Need This Book

If You Intend to Buy a Piano—No Matter What Make

A book—not a catalogue—that gives you all the information possessed by experts. It tells about the different materials used in the different parts of a piano; the way the different parts are put together, what causes pianos to get out of order, and in fact is a complete encyclopedia. It makes the selection of a piano easy. If read carefully, it will make you a judge of tone, action, workmanship and finish. It tells you how to test a piano and how to tell good from bad. It is absolutely the only book of its kind ever published. It contains 136 large pages and hundreds of illustrations, all devoted to piano construction. Its name is "The Book of Complete Information About Pianos." We send it free to anyone wishing to buy a piano. All you have to do is to send us your name and address.

SEND A POSTAL TO-DAY while you think of it, just giving your name and address, or send us the attached coupon and the valuable book of information, also full particulars about the WING PIANO, with prices, terms of payment, etc., will be sent to you promptly by mail.

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

S. S., Harrisburg, Pa. Please inform me through THE MAIL-BAG what was the origin of the "Easter egg" and what the significance?

The custom of presenting eggs to friends at Easter time originated, it is said, with the Persians, as symbolical of the creation or re-creation of spring. The practice prevailed also among the Jews, Egyptians and Hindus. Christians adopted the custom to symbolize the Resurrection.

Reader, Des Moines, Ia. Can you furnish any reliable estimates of the loss of life in recent wars, during the last hundred years?

A French statistician prepared a statement of losses in the wars of a century. The grand total is 14,000,000, divided as follows: Napoleonic wars, 8,000,000; Crimean wars, 300,000; Italian wars, 300,000; American Civil War, 500,000; Franco-German war, 80,000; Russo-Turkish war, 400,000; civil wars in South America, 500,000; various colonial expeditions in India, Mexico, Tonquin, South Africa, etc., 3,000,000. To these figures must be added the losses in the present war in the Far East, probably 750,000, in killed and wounded and missing. Russia's own estimate admits 500,000. We can give no assurance of absolute reliability of the figures in any of the wars mentioned, however, but believe them to be fairly correct.

Mrs. Anna M. T., Pittsburg, Ia. Will you please give me some information regarding Anna Shipton, and the title of her last book?

Anna Shipton is an English missionary and poetess, whose verse is remarkable for its spiritual tone. We do not know the title of her last work.

M. A. T., Glen Haven, Wis. What is the meaning of Ex. 10: 27, where it says, "God hardened Pharaoh's heart?"

God foreknew and "permitted" the hardening. Such is the interpretation placed by leading commentators upon the passage in question.

D. W. G., Uniontown, Ala. Can medicine be successfully taught by mail?

We have never heard that medicine could be successfully taught in any way except by actual training in the medical schools and hospitals.

E. H. R. Is it a safe proceeding for a Christian missionary in Africa to receive into the church a native woman who has been married as a seventh wife, the other six being still alive, and living with the same husband? This seventh wife was married before she had any knowledge of Christianity, and she was converted afterward. According to native law, she is the property of her husband and has no legal power to break with him. Similar cases can be found all over the Continent of Africa.

As the woman is to all intents and purposes a slave to her husband, however kindly treated, she cannot be held morally responsible for her slavery, and seemingly it would be a great hardship and injustice to debar her from Christian privileges on that account. But there are other considerations that might enter into such a case, making it impracticable to take her into full fellowship at the outset. We would be pleased to hear from our missionary friends on this somewhat perplexing subject.

LAHORE, INDIA, SHAKEN BY EARTHQUAKE

On April 4 a great earthquake caused widespread damage in Northern India, from Agra to Simla. The shocks occurred at 6.10 A.M., and lasted several minutes. In Lahore, a panic reigned, houses fell and mosques were badly cracked. In Mussoori, people could not stand in the streets; hotels, churches and many other buildings were wrecked. The native quarter of Dharmsala was destroyed. Amritsar, Jalandhar, Firozpur, Multan and Rawalpindi suffered much. Great loss of life is feared in Kashmir, Baltistan, Chitral, Leh and Merv. There was considerable native loss of life in India, but so far as known, few Europeans were killed. Food is now scarce in the ruined districts.

Bloodgood H. Cutler, the "Long Island farmer poet," breaks forth in song in praise of our premiums. We give these verses from a number he has sent us:

Your Calendar is very grand,
Designed by an artistic hand,
So natural the pictures look,
And grand enough for any book.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we should praise,
For their nice books in many ways,
True Christian precepts it does teach
To millions weekly it does reach.

G. W. A., Pittsburg, Pa. Does a horse pull or push the wagon that he is harnessed to?

Both. He pushes with the shoulder or forward harness and pulls with the rear straps. Properly speaking, anything that is behind is pulled, of course.

quirer, Jersey City, N. J., and others. Why did Jesus tell Mary not to touch him after his resurrection (John 20: 17)?

We are not told the reason, save as we ay infer it from Jesus' remark, that he d not yet ascended. It is probable, how- er, that he wished Mary to understand at the old terms of familiar intercourse ere unsuited then to his condition. What e change was that had passed over him the sepulchre we cannot imagine, but it evident that there was a change. It may that the spiritual body shrank from con- ct with the material body. When he had cended, Mary would, with other Chris- ans, have a new relation with him dearer d closer than before, but never again the d friendly relation of the days of his flesh. hat Jesus invited Thomas afterwards to uch the wounds, shows that the body was e same, and that for a clear object he ould permit contact; but Mary's gesture as the expression of mere human affec- on, so different from the spiritual inter- ourse that Christ would in future hold ith his people.

Mrs. Lucy Rogers, of Chamal, Tamaul- as, Mex., sends us this pleasing picture of fe in that salubrious region:

The Americans number about 600 here now, and ose who had lung trouble, and came here two ars ago for their health, have got well without edicine or doctors. There is virtually no sickness re: no wind, sand, or hail storms; no house-flies speak of; no mosquitoes. Milk keeps fresh uch longer than in the north, and does not curdle. utter keeps well and hard, if kept in the shade, nd never melts. The corn crop has never been a ilure here, and sweet potatoes, peas, beans, sugar- ne, highland rice, sorghum, alfalfa, para grass, nd all kinds of fibre plants are a sure crop each ear. We hire Mexican labor for eighteen cents r day; we get Mexican women to do out a big ashing for eighteen cents, and they are good ashers.

Water never freezes, and here it never gets as ot as in the North. You can pick ripe pine applee very day in the year. Oranges grow in quantities, nd the trees are now in blossom, while the old anges are not yet all gone. One can get ripe rawberries and nearly all garden produce from is own garden, every month in the year.

Ida N. A., New Haven, Conn. Why does Easter come at such uncertain times, sometimes in March and sometimes in April?

It follows the lunar system, as did the Jewish celebration of Passover. Most of the early Christians were of Jewish birth and would naturally associate the commemoration of our Lord's resurrection with the Passover. The celebration is fixed for the first Sunday after the first full moon that follows the equinox. It cannot, therefore, be earlier than March 22 nor later than April 25. That system was not adopted without much disputation. At first, following Jewish custom, the Easter celebration occurred on the fourteenth day of the moon, irrespective of the day of the week. But gradually the practice of observing it on a Sunday was established, and in the seventh century became general. The Greek Church, adhering to the old calendar, seldom observes Easter on the same day as the Western churches, as March 21 with them is thirteen days later than with us.

S. T., North Dakota. What is the length of time for which a book may be copyrighted?

The original term of a copyright is twenty-eight years. The author, or his widow or children, may get a renewal for fourteen years more, if application is made six months before the expiration of the first copyright. This also applies to works of designers, etc.

Inquirer, N. Y. Who are the Forty Immortals that are so frequently mentioned in literature?

They are the forty members of the French Academy, one of the five academies that constitute the Institute of France. It was founded by Cardinal Richelieu in 1635. A member is elected for life, and a candidate must make a personal application for election. The nomination must be sanctioned by the French President. It is the highest ambition of a French writer to be made a member of the Academy, but, as a matter of fact, the election of a candidate is far from a proof of his literary ability. Some of the most famous Frenchmen have been barred out on account of professional jealousy, etc. The Academy meets twice a week, and has been considered the highest authority on all questions dealing with grammatical points of the French language, rhetoric, and poetry.

J. D., Paterson, N. J. What was the point of the charge made by Mrs. Craigie, in the debate in England regarding the choosing of women for jury duty?

She took ground against her own sex, and declared that "their nature did not contain a proper element of justice; they were naturally unfair, could not be impartial, and were not intended to govern."

Mrs. A. S. G., Detroit. The "Flying Rollers" are a band of evangelists from some Western State who are now visiting England.

M. M., Rahway, N. J. No. Isabelle and Elizabeth are the same. The former is the French form of the name, the latter the Spanish.

J. H. R., Homer, Neb. We can see no harm in proper athletic sports, but advocacy of the theatre is sadly out of place in a Christian pulpit.

S. G. B., Germantown, Pa. One experienced raiser says that feeding your hens bones, or some animal food, will stop them from eating their own eggs.

C. H. W., New Braunfels. Religion, or the lack of it, is no bar to citizenship, nor to the holding of public office. As officials, on being sworn in, take the oath in the prescribed form, this involves recognition of a Divine Being. We do not see how such an oath could be taken by an infidel.

H. P. C., Jersey City. We believe the church should keep out of politics. There are evils, however, entirely irrespective of politics, which pastors should denounce, and the drink traffic is the first and foremost of these. That traffic they should fight by every means in their power. You can abundantly fortify yourself with Scripture on this ground.

R. J., Pa. The "divine healers" in their vigorous assaults upon medical men, overlook the fact tuat the Mosaic law recognized the old school physician by sending him patients, and requiring that his fees be paid (see Exodus 21: 18, 19). "And if men strive together, and one smite another with a stone, or with his fist, and he die not, but keepeth to his bed: If he rise again and walk abroad upon his staff, then shall he that smote him be quit, only he shall pay for the loss of his time, and shall cause him to be thoroughly healed." In the Septuagint version this last clause reads: "shall pay the physician's fee." All of which is good modern law and practice.

Beautify and Protect Your Home

Old Fogy Ideas No Longer Prevail in the Adornment of the Twentieth Century Home. Up-to-Date Methods More Economical and Effective.

"I was born and bred into the belief that old-style white lead paint was the law and gospel of paint wisdom.

"If there is a locality on earth which is harder than any others on paint, it is Pittsburg. My experience has been that under the most favorable conditions, the very best white lead paint will not stand to exceed one year in this city and look good.

"Because a customer insisted, about five years ago, I painted his house with Carrara paint, I honestly believed he was making a mistake and told him so.

"The paint went on easy and gallon for gallon spread almost 25 per cent. farther than any I had ever used. I did not believe it would last. To my astonishment that house looked better at the end of two years than others in the neighborhood that had been painted less than six months.

"It set me to thinking and investigating and to-day I am recommending and using Carrara Paint wherever possible."

This testimony, from a well-known Pittsburg contractor, is corroborated by thousands of others all over America.

Carrara paint not only wears many times as long and looks twice as well as any other paint, but it actually costs much less in the beginning.

It is the very best and most durable paint that can be made at any price.

There is but one CARRARA, and only one grade, which is always the best. It is made by the Carrara Paint Co., 185 Carrara Works, Barberton, Ohio. Anyone having anything to paint should send for fifty free sample colors and our handsome, illustrated booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted with this great paint. Distributing depots in all principal cities. Write to day, telling us what you have to paint, and we will send you names of those who have used Carrara Paint in your locality, name of nearest dealer and show you how to beautify your property and save half your paint bills in the future.

This, Too, Shall Pass Away

ART thou in misery, brother? This I say,
Be comforted. Thy grief shall pass away.

Art thou elated? Ah! be not too gay;
Temper thy joy. This, too, shall pass away.

Art thou in danger? Still let reason sway,
And cling to hope. This, too, shall pass away.

Tempted art thou? In all thine anguish lay
One truth to heart. This, too, shall pass away.

Do rays of laureled glory round thee play?
Kinglike art thou? This, too, shall pass away.

Whate'er thou art, where'er thy footsteps stray,
Heed wisdom's voice: All things must pass away. PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE.

How One Man Gave Up Tobacco

AT the time of my conversion I had been using tobacco—and in no very moderate way—for more than twenty-five years, both chewing and smoking. In a very few days after I found the Lord, I was made to see very clearly that for me, the use of tobacco was wrong, and I must give it up. I did so at once, and have never used it since. My deliverance came about in this way:

I was convicted at a noonday prayer meeting at Farwell Hall, in Chicago. At the close of the meeting, I went into Revell's bookstore, underneath, and bought a testament. For years I had carried my tobacco in my left hip-pocket. I took out my tobacco-box and put the Testament in the same pocket. On reaching home, I gave the tobacco-box to my wife, saying: "Keep this until I call for it."

She smiled as she took it, and said: "Going to swear off again, are you?"

"Oh, no," said I, "but you may keep the box until I call for it."

"You'll be back after it before the week is out," returned my wife.

You see, she knew me, for I had often tried to give up the habit, but had never been able to do it. But I soon found that there was a great difference in trying to do a thing in [my own strength, and in the strength of Christ. My wife has now kept that box for nearly twenty years, and the same tobacco is in it yet, a memorial to me that I had supernatural help.

Giving me deliverance from tobacco was the first great thing the Lord did for me in my Christian life, and this has made it easy for me to look to him for all needed help ever since.

When I would be engaged in writing and lost in thought, my hand would occasionally go to my hip pocket, feeling for that tobacco box, and out would come the Testament. I would open it and read the first verse my eye fell upon, and then mark it with a pencil. All Scripture was so full of meaning to me that I would fall into meditation over the verse read, and forget all about the tobacco.

The first thing I knew I was not only free from the filthy habit which had so long enslaved me, but my desire for it had been changed into disgust, which remains even unto this day, making a return to it unthinkable.

Next to opium there is probably no habit harder to give up than tobacco, and every man who has had experience with it knows it. The reformed drunkard gives up his drink easier than he does his tobacco.

When the ark of God was taken into the house of Dagon (I. Sam. 5 : 4), the idol fell down and broke off his head and both hands, and this is exactly what happened in my case. It is always so. Look to Christ for deliverance from your idols, and down they will go. Try putting a Bible where you keep your pipe and bottle.—ELIJAH P. BROWN in The Ram's Horn.

Called Higher

Called to the higher life on Jan. 14, 1905, at Colorado Springs, Mr. E. B. Sprague, aged 73 years.

Mrs. Rebecca J. Lovett of Hurst, W. Va., died in Denver, Colo., Oct. 4, 1904, a faithful Christian for many years.

Died at Maysville, Ky., Jan. 7, 1905, Mrs. Elizabeth Caroline Reeder. The funeral was held at the residence of her son, Mr. Lissant Cox. Mrs. Reeder was one of the oldest subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

On Jan. 17, 1905, Mrs. Flora Baumgartner, of Jacksville, Mich. Mrs. Baumgartner was a faithful Christian and temperance worker, and for several years conducted the first Sunday School in a little town on Lake Superior, organizing a "Band of Hope" for children. The last Sunday of her life Mrs. Baumgartner taught the Sunday School.

Near Petrolia, Humboldt County, Calif., Mary Amanda Miner Dudley, wife of M. R. Dudley, born Nov. 16, 1843, called home March 2, 1905. Mrs. Dudley was endowed with a most lovable disposition; she gave many years to earnest study of the life and wishes of her Lord and Master; she loved all God's creatures and was loved by all who knew her.

Died on April 7, 1904, Mr. Peter Nickles of Jamestown, Mo. Mr. Nickles was in his eightieth year and had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD since its first issue. He was for many years a faithful member of the Methodist Church, and it was through his efforts and help that a Methodist Chapel was built in Biel, Switzerland, his birthplace.

At Watertown, N. Y., on Dec. 13, 1904, Mrs. Martha Pearson was called to her heavenly home, aged seventy-one years and eight months. She was a daughter of the late Rev. John Morse, Baptist minister, Bradenstoke, England. A member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family, she dearly loved its weekly visits. At the end of each year, the volumes were bound and kept among her treasures.

The FELS-NAPTHA New

COSTS LITTLE, DOES MUCH

SAVES WOMAN'S LIFE

A STARTLING POSSIBILITY

Half a Day's Work Cut Out of Every Week.

It Means a Great Deal More Than Perhaps You Think It Means, To Save a Woman Half a Day Every Week of Her Life.

Cutting wash-day in half with Fels-Naptha soap means more than the saving of time. It means saving the most precious part of a woman's life.

Health, youth, good looks, cheerfulness—all the things that make her life worth living—are dragged out of a woman before her time by the unnecessary slavish drudgery of common wash-days.

Nearly all this hard labor is stopped by Fels-Naptha.

It saves strength and energy and womanly vigor.

Like money laid up in the bank drawing interest, this saving goes on week by week, mounting up to years of added life and happiness.

The remarkable nature of Fels-Naptha is to loosen all the dirt quickly and completely, without hurting the clothes.

And it does this either in cold water or water just warm enough to be comfortable to the hands.

Does the same thing that boiling is intended to do, and does it better.

It is entirely different from other soaps and washing compounds.

Fels-Naptha Soap

No raging fire, with extra coal to lug—and to pay for; no disagreeable suds'-steam (perhaps a bad cold is saved); no lifting the boiler on and off; no lifting the clothes in and out of the boiler.

Just think of it! No boiling, and much less rubbing.

And what is the result?

The clothes are really cleaner and more purified than you can get them with the common way of washing, no matter how ha you work or how mu scalding you do.

They look brighter, and we longer.

The clothes are not rubbed pieces. You save money. Abo all, you save a good measure that day's life.

If life is worth anything to yo or to your help, you can't affo to delay.

You can't afford to let anoth wash-day go over your head wit out trying Fels-Naptha.

Surprising Discover

Thousands of women aston ished at new value found i a familiar article.

A multitude of wome have lately discovered tha Fels-Naptha soap is sur prisingly effective in way they never dreamed of.

Its wonderful purifyin qualities take away al germs and impurities. It i a great boon to pet animals as it drives off fleas and leaves fur soft and fluffy.

It cleans beautifully glass, silverware, fine rugs oil cloths, straw and felt hats, silks, laces and other delicate fabrics, and some ladies say it is a grand thing to keep off dandruff and make the hair bright and glossy.

Ask your grocer for it to-day. If he hasn't it, send us his name and we will send you a free sample cake.

A Memorable Sunday in Philadelphia

By Pastor Charles Wagner

Author of "The Simple Life," "By the Fireside," etc.

"Bethany Church at Philadelphia was for me," says Pastor Wagner, "the first revelation of a religious life manifested in forms entirely new to my experience." Beginning with the morning meeting of the Brotherhood of nine hundred men, and closing with an evening communion service of sacred impressiveness, he has written for The Sunday School Times the story of that entire day. He tells of Mr. Wanamaker's great Sunday-school, and how it impressed him. Pastor Wagner's article will appear exclusively in an early issue of The Sunday School Times, which issue will be sent free, upon request.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: $1.00 per year. In clubs of five or more to separate addresses, 75 cents each per year. One free copy with every ten paid for in a club.

A Rich Girl's Experience

IN her story, The Singular Miss Smith, Mrs. Florence M. Kingsley deals in a new and delightfully interesting way with the problem of consecrated wealth. An educated young woman, rich as the world's estimate of riches goes, yet poor in happiness and without plan or purpose in life, suddenly experiences an awakening which invests existence with a new purpose. She is "singular," in the sense of being very different from other young women of her own station in society. Wishing to know something of "the other side," she leaves her fine home and luxurious surroundings and engages as a domestic servant. Now the real romance of her life begins, for Anne Smith, the poorly paid, overworked kitchen help, gets a clearer insight into human nature and a better understanding of the duties and opportunities of the rich, than if she had remained at home, "in luxury's lap." Incidentally, she meets a "foundryman" (who is, like herself, a student of sociology, seeing "the other side"), and he takes a deep interest in her career, neither knowing the other's secret. Meeting her after a short absence, the sociological foundryman is solicitous about her welfare.

"Where have you been, child?" he asked. Are you coming back to Mrs. Buckle's?" His eyes roved anxiously over me. "But no; you mustn't go there again; it is not a fit place for you." After a pause, he added, thoughtfully: "I am going away soon, so I am glad to have this little good-by talk. Did you keep the address I gave you, Anne?"

"I have a place, thank you!" I murmured. Then I added, hastily: "I only wanted to ask you about that rich young man. Do you think he ought to have sold all his property?"

"The rich young man?" he replied, frowning and eyeing me suspiciously. "What rich young man?"

"The one in the Bible," I explained. "Don't you think Christ meant that he should give away the interest on his money, and—and live simply: I mean give up living like a very rich man? I ought to tell you I've gone back to live with the rich woman I told you of, and—and she's very much interested in that chapter. Sometimes I read it to her nights. She does give away a great deal of money, and I don't think she means to be selfish."

His face had cleared and brightened wonderfully as I went on with my halting and deceitful explanation. I felt thoroughly ashamed as his attentive eyes rested on my face. "Do you know, Anne," he said warmly, "I am wonderfully pleased to think you remembered our little talk, and that you are trying to help on the great cause in the world. Your reward will come to you, my child, never fear."

"What is the great cause?" I demanded. "If I am to help it on, as you say, I must at least know what it is."

"The great cause," he answered directly, "is the bringing to pass in the world of universal brotherhood. Not the artificial, tied-on, make-believe sort, that our preachers prate about year in and year out, but the real brotherhood that Christ preached. God, the Father of all human beings, Christ, the Elder Brother."

"That's just what our rector says almost every Sunday," I murmured resignedly; "it doesn't seem to me very much."

"That's just the trouble, Anne!" he said, with strong indignation; "it doesn't mean anything. The very men who preach this gospel of brotherhood, are sleek and well fed in their broadcloth and silk. They jostle one another in their scramble for big-salaried churches. They soothe and coddle the rich members of their congregations. They have turned the fiery sayings of the Master into meaningless platitudes, which they chant monotonously into the drowsy ear of humanity. Tell your rich woman that Christ meant just what he said. Tell her to obey, and enter into the Kingdom."

"What would she find there?" I asked. "Remember she is a woman and alone in the world. If she becomes poor, what could she do?"

"God is her Father, and she need fear nothing," he answered. "The Kingdom means abundance, Anne. Not the abundance of the muck-rake and the moth-eaten, rust-corrupted hoard, but the boundless opulence of the father's house. . . . No child of God need fear present poverty, nor hoard for a rainy day, nor want—anything. Your rich woman cannot find out these things about the Father till she lets go her foolish money. She must let it go, Anne, and you must make her do it. You can. And I honestly believe that is your mission in life. You would not have come to me else." His eyes glowed. His whole face was transfigured.

"Oh, why are you a foundryman?" I cried.

"Why was Christ a carpenter?" he answered.

Just how this sociological foundryman, who was not a foundryman at all, anymore than Anne Smith was a kitchen-help, made all these things quite clear to her, and how it all came about happily and romantically in the end, the reader must find out in the book itself. It is a fascinating story, unique in theme and treatment and thoroughly enjoyable from the first page to the last. Price, $1.25. The Macmillan Co., London and New York, publishers.

What Will You Give For

HEALTH AND A GOOD FIGURE?

Will you give me 15 minutes in your own home and get well without drugs?

—perfectly, completely well, with that glad, joyous freedom and happiness in life and sweet personal loveliness which health and a well developed, graceful body alone can give? There is nothing in girlhood or womanhood as lovely as a healthy, vigorous, well-kept body, sound and sweet and wholesome, full of life and strength and fire. There is nothing which gives a woman such power to win love and wield influence.

If the lungs, heart, nerves and every vital organ of the body are strong, there is no need of drugs or medicine. The permanent relief from weaknesses can only be in regaining the strength of weakened organs. It has been shown that about 8,000 out of the 40,000 druggists are handling adulterated drugs and probably fifty per cent. of the drugs contain morphine.

DRUGS ARE DANGEROUS

Any woman by practicing fifteen minutes each day in her own room can have a good figure, clear skin, strong brain and the perfect bodily poise which results from a sound condition of all the vital functions. We women do not want large muscles, but we want that vibrant life force born of a healthful spirit which makes life worth living. We also want flexible, symmetrical, well rounded figures with that graceful, dignified, easy carriage which denotes character, culture and refinement.

EVERY WOMAN CAN HAVE A CLEAR SKIN AND A GOOD FIGURE

My instructions by mail are strictly individual and strictly confidential. I direct the exercise, bathing and diet adapted to your condition, teach you how to breathe, how to stand, how to walk. I strengthen the stomach and the nerves so that your food will nourish you; strengthen the liver, kidneys and intestines so that all impurities are thrown from your system; stimulate a sluggish circulation, send the blood bounding through your veins, so that you feel warm and comfortable, put you in a condition to resist colds; strengthen weak hearts and lungs, relieve you of weaknesses, lame backs and headaches. When this is done, you will have a clear brain, a quick perception and a vibrant life force.

I HAVE HELPED 15,000 WOMEN TO HELP THEMSELVES

I wish you could read the mail on my desk for one day—it would make you happy as it does me. I am quoting to you below extracts from some letters from my pupils. Some of these names I have permission to give—others I have not—but I can duplicate any one of these extracts many times a day.

"I have a better color in my face than I have had for sixteen years." "My neck, chest and bust are filling out beautifully, and I have gained 14 pounds in the last two months." "I have left off my glasses, Miss Cocroft, and my eyes are much stronger." "Just think! I can eat anything, my indigestion is all gone." "My catarrh is entirely gone." "The kidneys and liver are working splendidly, and after twenty years my constipation seems to be entirely relieved." "I have not had a headache since my first lesson, Miss Cocroft, and the doctor says my heart and lungs are much stronger, and I am sure my nerves are. Those neuralgic pains have entirely gone." "I have lost 66 pounds. Can you believe it? My husband says I look 20 years younger." "Those lumps which I feared were tumors have all gone, and I have no more rheumatism. I'm so happy."

I take but a limited number of pupils, because I give each pupil my personal attention. I do not work with a woman unless I am sure I can help her. I know I can Reduce Prominent Abdomens and Hips, build up Thin Necks and Chests and bring any woman to roundness and symmetry. I have done all of these hundreds and hundreds of times. It is no longer an experiment with me.

Write to me, telling me your particular difficulties, and I will send you letters from my pupils and give you the names of women who have been relieved of above and other difficulties. I will send you an instructive booklet on how to stand correctly. Every woman should know this if she would be perfectly well. I charge you nothing for this booklet and nothing for my information in regard to your case. Do not hesitate to write me. I hold pupils' letters in confidence.

CURRENT ANECDOTES

A Cheering Memory

COMFORT in bereavement very often comes from unexpected sources. A clergyman who called on a member of his flock who was grieving over the loss of a beloved daughter, says: "He told me that the incident which had comforted him most among all the telegrams and letters, and flowers, and visits which he had received from his many acquaintances and friends, was the visit of an Irish laundress, who, with tears streaming down her cheeks, said: 'The last time I saw your little angel was when my boy was sick, and I could not leave him to go to work, and I was afraid the children were going to be hungry. My heart was almost breaking, when that blessed child came tramping ankle-deep through the snowstorm, with a basket full of provisions for me and the children. I have loved her and prayed for her every day since then. Sure, it's in heaven she is.' My friend brushed the glad tears from his eyes as he told me, and said, 'That has comforted me more than anything else.'" "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, and their works do follow them."

A Dread Removed

A LITTLE child was in the habit of playing in a large and beautiful garden with sunny lawns; but there was one part of it, a long and winding path overshadowed by trees, down which he never ventured; indeed, he dreaded to go near it, because a foolish nurse had told him that ogres and hobgoblins dwelt within its darksome gloom. At last his eldest brother heard of this fear, and after playing one day with him took him to the embowered entrance of the grove, and leaving him there terror-stricken, went singing through its length, and returned and reasoned with the child, proving that his fears were groundless. At last he took the little fellow's hand, and they went through it together, and from that moment the fear that had haunted the place fled. So Jesus, having passed through the valley of death, gives courage to his people. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me."

Only a Little Lace Pedler

ONE hot summer day, a dark-browed young woman walked down the street of a small New Hampshire village, selling fine laces and Oriental embroideries. She entered the little post-office and asked permission to open her traveling case. The contents were unfolded and described with a patience and sweetness that never suggested a long, weary day, with few to purchase. As the little pedler was refolding the last of the beautiful articles, one of the group asked with interest, "From what country did you come?" She replied in her careful English with its pretty accent, "I from Turkey," then, a radiant smile lighting up the tired features, she quickly added, "But I am not Mohammedan—I Christian." She was only a girl selling laces, but she found the opportunity to say with a smile, "I Christian."

A Churchless People

NEW YORK is doubtless the most cosmopolitan town in the world. While the English language is mostly spoken, there are different peoples who speak their own language in their own churches and chapels. There is one nationality in the city of New York which has no house of its own for worship, and this is the Finns. There are many of them in the metropolis. The missionary among the Finlanders in New York, Rev. Gustav Blomgren, is struggling hard to secure a church home for his people. Pastor Blomgren's idea is to get a house costing about $10,000, and to have the first floor for use as a chapel, the next floor a home for the pastor, and the upper floor as a Christian home for young people, with the basement for a Sunday School. Contributions can be sent directly to the pastor, Rev. Gustav Blomgren, 2137 Madison Avenue, New York City, who will gratefully acknowledge them.

THE NAME is stamped on every Loop.

A Voice from Heaven

I SHINE in the light of God,
His image stamps my brow, [have trod,
Through the shadows of death my feet
And I reign in glory now.
No breaking heart is here,
No keen and thrilling pain,
No wasted cheek where the burning tear
Hath rolled and left its stain.

I have found the joys of heaven
I am one of the angel band,
To my head a crown is given,
And a harp is in my hand.
I have learned the songs they sing,
Whom Jesus hath made free,
And the glorious walls of heaven still ring
With my new-born melody.

No sin, no grief, no pain—
Safe in my happy home -
My fears all fled my doubts all slain,
My hour of triumph come.
Oh friends of my mortal years,
The trusted and the true,
You're walking still in the vale of tears,
But I wait to welcome you.

Do I forget? Oh, no!
For memory's golden chain
Shall bind my heart to the hearts below.
Will they meet and touch again?
Each link is strong and bright,
While love's electric flame
Flows freely down, like a river of light,
To the world from which it came.

Do you mourn when another star
Shines out from the glorious sky?
Do you weep when the voice of war
And the rage of conflict die?
Why then should your tears roll down,
Or your heart be sorely riven
For another gem in the Saviour's crown,
And another soul in heaven? Anon.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Miss. "I wish to thank God for a wonderful answer to prayer."

M. M., Canada. "For many years I have taken all my troubles to Him in prayer, and He has never failed me."

Reader, Georgia. "I beg the prayers of all the readers that my faith should be strengthened, and if it can be God's will, my petition soon answered."

S. S. M. D., Pennsylvania. "God has most graciously granted my prayer. It is always safe to trust God and ask his help and have faith in his words."

Thankful Mother, Bellwood, Nebr. "Two of my children were very sick, one was for a long time at death's door, but God heard my prayer and made them both well again."

Reader. "I want to acknowledge God's love and mercy in answering my prayers. He has greatly blessed me. I want the prayers of God's children. 'If God be for us, who can be against us.'"

Subscriber. "My mother was blind. An operation was successful, and her sight is restored. This is only one. Many other prayers have been answered, and I still come to Him and ask for me."

S. T., Connecticut. "I sincerely believe God in his goodness has answered the prayer of one of his children and has made me a more sincere believer than ever in prayer and I will try to live so as to show my love to him."

Reader, New York. "I desire to acknowledge answered prayer. I was in great trouble and I called upon the Lord, and he delivered me. Praise his holy name. He always helps if we are faithful. My heart is full of thankfulness."

Reader, Ohio. "I received a special answer to prayer in behalf of my dear son, and also for another son in Colorado. I want to acknowledge God's goodness that it may encourage others who are praying for their loved ones."

A Traveling Missionary Library

Along the Blue Ridge and down in the level countries of lower Virginia, lie a number of circles, for the most part small and poor. They belong to the Presbytery of West Hanover, part of historic Hanover, the first in the Old Dominion dating back to 1756. The ladies of this Presbytery have formed a Union of their societies, and they want to send a traveling library of books improving and helpful to home and foreign missions to those churches which are unable to get them for themselves. The class of people is not the "poor whites," but just the opposite, generally the old landowners, impoverished first by the war, and now by the exodus of their young men to the West, and their laborers to the cities. They are intelligent, appreciative people of influence, trying to uplift their still poorer neighbors. The books would help them in holding the Light in many a dark place, besides cheering lonely lives. The Union just formed has no funds for this noble purpose; it is endeavoring to gather "seed corn" for planting the general work. Can some who read this help by sending a book from their shelves, or money to buy books? Such aid will greatly encourage and help those women who are undertaking a great work in the face of many difficulties. Address Mrs. John R. Sampson, Pantops Academy, Charlottesville, Va.

Revival in North Carolina

A series of meetings were begun at Highfalls, N.C., recently, by Ada E. Lee of Greensboro, N. C. She was joined in the work later by Kathleen Lidley of Dobson, N.C., and also by Davis Branon. Fifteen meetings were held at Highfalls and two at Prosperity. Christian people were much strengthened. Through these efforts, the Friends of Highfalls and Prosperity are now organized for definite work, with Davis Branon as resident minister. The Friends in Highfalls need a meeting house. They will welcome any aid that may be sent for that purpose to George White of Guilford College, N. C.

$15.00 HIGH CLASS MADE TO MEASURE SUITS

$5.00 SUITS. How others can advertise made to measure suits as low as $5.00 to $10.00, what their scheme is and why the American Woolen Mills Co., the most progressive tailors in the United States, can undersell every other concern in fine made to measure tailoring for men is all fully explained in our wonderfully interesting book of cloth samples, entitled, "$15.00 Tailoring for Fine Dressers." Our $15.00 Suits and Overcoats are made to measure by the only system in the world that insures a perfect fit in every instance for customers ordering at a distance. Our $15.00 Suits are intended for good dressers, professional and business men who have been in the habit of ordering suits to measure at $25.00 to $50.00. Our $15.00 suits are not approached in variety of style, quality of materials, trimmings, workmanship, style, shape or fit by any tailor anywhere even at three times our $15.00 price.

Cut this ad. out and send to us and if we have a local representative in your town or vicinity, we will ask him to show you our immense line of samples of 400 styles and show you our astonishingly low price proposition and guarantee offer. If we have no representative there we will send you by return mail, free, postpaid, a handsome book of cloth samples, fashions, tape measure, special price offerings, all our inducements and special offers on extra fine tailoring, such as is unknown to other wholesale tailoring houses.

One good representative wanted in every town, city and community where we are not already represented. Live merchant, clothier, or one with tailoring experience preferred, but will accept any live, hustling outside experienced man who can prove to us he can sell goods and can give satisfactory references. No beginners or inexperienced men accepted. We prefer such men as are now successfully handling some line of tailoring and would like a much better connection.

WE DOUBLE YOUR BUSINESS AND PROFITS IMMEDIATELY

for we give you a bigger, handsomer and better line than any other house and make prices lower than any other house. We make quicker shipments, do better work, better service and insure fit such as no other house can.

And further, we sell your goods for you, for this and similar announcements will appear from time to time in all publications of large circulation. Dozens, if not hundreds or even thousands of responses will come to us from your town or vicinity, and every inquiry will be referred to you. We find you the customer (at our expense), we write the customer to call on you and we write you to see the customer, we bring customer and representative together, we build up your business for you. Our line is worth more to you than all other tailors to the trade lines in America combined. If you are now selling, or can satisfy us you can sell $1,000.00 or more a year in tailoring, then write to us, and if we are not represented in your town, we will open your eyes to the possibilities by mailing you a proposition no other wholesale tailoring house has ever thought of offering.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved Through the Foot-Pores

Nature's Method of Expelling Impurities. Don't Take Medicine. Thousands Are Being Relieved by New External Remedy Which All Can

TRY FREE—PAY WHEN SATISFIED

We want every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has rheumatism to send us his or her name to-day. We will send each by return mail a pair of the new Magic Foot Drafts which have excited so much comment by their remarkable results in Michigan and other rheumatic States. Try them. If you are satisfied with the comfort they give you send us One Dollar. If not, they cost you nothing. You decide.

Magic Foot Drafts relieve by drawing out and absorbing the acid poisons in the blood through the foot-pores, which are the largest in the body. They relieve rheumatism in every part of the body—to stay relieved—because they purify the blood. At the same time they impart to the blood certain neutralizing agents which hasten the relief. It must be evident to you that we couldn't afford to send a dollar pair of Drafts on Approval if they didn't relieve. Write to-day to Magic Foot Draft Co., R A 22 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich., for a trial pair of Drafts on approval. We send also a valuable booklet (in colors) on Rheumatism.

AGONY

of toothache is instantly relieved by Dent's Toothache Gum. It stops any ache, whether there's a cavity or not, cleanses the cavity of foulness and odors, prevents further aching, stays in place, will not mar in the mouth.

Dent's Toothache Gum

is most economical—keeps for years, will not dry up—or spill. Used by leading dentists. Sold by responsible druggists. 15c or by mail. Be sure it's DENT'S. Dent's Gum also removes corns, calluses and warts—15c at druggists, or by mail. The Arch of Pearls, sent free, tells how to take care of and preserve the teeth.

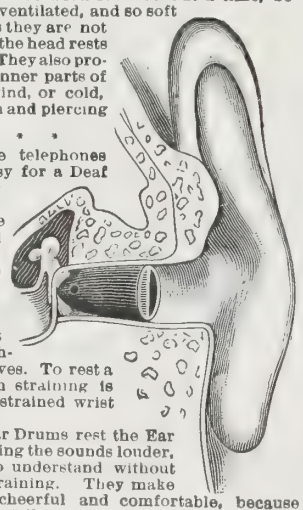
PLUMBING

Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Listening Machines Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Ever see a pair of Listening Machines?
They make the Deaf hear distinctly.
They are so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them.
And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.
Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers.
They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain off them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off.
And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.



* * * *

These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.
Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

* * * *

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.
This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.
Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and cured (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.
A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.
Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.
Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.
This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it today. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.
Write for it today to the Wilson Ear Drum Co. 190 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

THE CHILD MARTYR

IN Antioch, where the disciples were first called Christians, a deacon from the church of Caesarea was called to endure cruel torture to force him to deny his Lord. While he was being tortured he still declared his faith, saying, "There is but one God and one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus." His body was almost torn to pieces. The cruel Emperor Galerius seemed to enjoy looking upon him in his suffering.

At length this martyr said to his tormentors, "Ask any Christian child whether it is better to worship one God, the maker of heaven and earth, and one Saviour who has died for us and is able to bring us to God, or to worship the gods many and lords many whom the Romans serve."

There stood by a Roman mother who had brought her little boy, nine years of age, that he might witness the sufferings of this martyr from Caesarea. The question was asked the child. He quickly replied, "God is one, and Christ is one with the Father." The prosecutor was filled with fresh rage, and cried out, "O base and wicked Christian, thou hast taught this child to answer thus." Then turning to the boy he said, more mildly, "Child, who taught thee to thus speak? How did you learn this faith?"

The boy looked lovingly into his mother's face and said, "It was God that taught it to my dear mother, and she taught me that Jesus Christ loved little children, and so I learned to love him for his first love for me."

"Let us see now what the love of Christ can do for you," cried the cruel judge, and at a sign from him the officers, who stood by with their rods, after the fashion of the Romans, quickly seized the poor boy and made ready to torture him.

"What can the love of Christ do for him now?" asked the judge, as the blood streamed from the tender flesh of the child.

"It helps him," answered the mother, "to bear what his Master endured for him, when he died on the Cross."

Again they smote the child, and every blow seemed to torture the agonized mother as much as the child. As the blows, faster and heavier, were laid upon the bleeding boy, they asked, "What can the love of Christ do for him now?" Tears fell from heathen eyes as that Roman mother replied, "It teaches him to forgive his tormentors."

The boy watched his mother's eye, and no doubt thought of the suffering of his Lord and Saviour, and when his tormentors asked if he would serve the gods they served, he still answered, "I will not deny Christ. There is no other God but one, and Jesus Christ is the Redeemer of the world. He loved me and died for me, and I love him with all my heart."

The poor child at last fainted beneath the repeated strokes, and they cast the torn and bleeding body into the mother's arms, saying, supposing that he was dead, "See now what the love of Christ has done for your Christian boy." As the mother gently pressed him to her crushed heart, she answered, "That love will take him from the wrath of man to the peace of heaven, where God shall wipe away all tears."

But the boy had not yet passed over the river. Opening his eyes he said, "Mother, can I have a drop of water from our cool well?" As he closed his eyes again, the mother said, "Already, dearest, thou hast tasted of the well that springeth up into everlasting life. Farewell; thy Saviour calls for thee. Happy, happy martyr! for his sake may he grant thy mother grace to follow in thy bright path."

To the surprise of all, after they thought he had breathed his last, he raised his eyes, and looking to where the elder martyr was, he said, in almost a whisper, "There is but one God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent."

With these words upon his parched lips he passed into God's presence, where is fullness of joy, and to his right hand, where are pleasures for evermore.

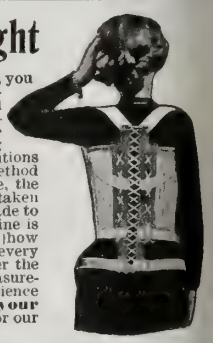
Crooked Spines Made Straight



If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of spinal curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the work being effected. Noted physicians in prominent medical institutions and in private practice are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebræ is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction, or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Write for our new book giving full information and references.

OUR MAIL BAG

Questions and Answers

Letters for this department must contain name and address of the sender—not for publication, but in order that an answer may be sent by mail in cases where the inquiry is not of general interest.

Mrs. J. C., Factoryville, Pa. What was the given name of General Howe, of Revolutionary days?

George A. Howe, with the title of Viscount, was an English general, who served under Commander-in-Chief Abercrombie, at Ticonderoga, and met his death in 1758. He was an able and popular officer. Another was Sir William Howe, who defeated the colonial armies at White Plains, Brandywine, etc. He was afterward unsuccessful in strategy, and was superseded.

L. L. P., Alfred, Me. Admitting that a gift to missions is ill-gotten gain, would it not be pleasing in the sight of God to accept it to educate the ignorant, feed the hungry and clothe the naked, from whom it may have, directly or indirectly, been taken? Is not one-third of the money that is handled or in circulation every day of our lives, directly or indirectly, ill-gotten gain? If this is true, why hesitate to accept this?

Leaving all specific cases aside, and without presuming to judge any individual case, we consider that the general principle stands good, that money which is obviously and undeniably the result of vice, crime, wrongdoing or injustice, is not an acceptable gift in God's sight. See Isaiah 61: 8—"I hate robbery for burnt-offering." As we are forbidden to judge a brother, in the absence of indisputable evidence of his sin, it would be clearly wrong to condemn such a one on clamor, or suspicion or innuendo.

Reader, Salem, Mass. What is the "Book of Tephi?"

You probably mean "Nephi," the name given to three of the so-called Books of Mormon.

Reader, New Orleans, La. What are we to understand, in the widest sense, is the incoming of the "golden age"? Does it simply refer to the golden age of innocence, which is purely mythical?

In the classical sense, the golden age was the time before the fall, when man had not yet lost his first innocence, and when, as the ancient Greeks and Romans believed, the gods dwelt among men. The golden age of any special race or nation refers to the period of its highest glory and power. Thus, the golden age of Assyria was from 691 to 606 B. C.; of Babylonia, from 606 to 538 B. C.; of China (during the Tang dynasty) from 618 to 626 B. C., etc. Besides, there is the golden age of literature and of invention.

Mrs. S. A. G., Warner, N. H. Why are the ministers so surprised at the outpouring of God's Spirit in this age?

The manifestations of the Spirit cause natural astonishment, because they come unexpectedly; yet there is no cause for supposing the astonishment arises from incredulity. As far as pastors generally are concerned, our observation shows that they gladly welcome the news of these manifestations in any quarter.

Mr. A. L. Martin, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

I wish you woud advocate fonetic speling and a fonetic alfabet, so our forin citisans and iland residents kood lurn to read the Inglish languig.

Phonetic spelling is yet a long way off, we fear, although it has certainly made progress in the last half century. The only really phonetic writing we know of at the present time is phonography.

J. W. C., Chicago, Ills. Are the Hebrew Children the descendants of Heber, and are spoken of in history as Abraham and his descendants?

The term "Hebrew" was used first of Abraham, presumably as the descendant of Heber (Gen. 14: 13), and the Jews themselves hold that the name of "Hebrews," applied to them, was derived from Heber, the ancestor of Abraham (see Gen. 10: 21 and 24, and Numbers 24: 24). Josephus, the Jewish historian, in Book 1, Chapter 6, paragraph 5 of the Antiquities, affirms that the term "Hebrews" was derived from Heber and not from Abram.

F. B., Trenton, N. J. What was the final decision of the American Board Congregational Foreign Missions regarding the $100,000 gift?

The committee decided that it had no right, "by returning the gift, to set up a new ethical standard with regard to missionary giving, against the judgment of a majority of its corporate members." These members, by a vote of 164 against 25, decided that it should be retained.

Rev. Henry Loomis, of Yokohama, Japan, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, making appeal in behalf of the many Russian prisoners now at Shiznoka, for Bibles, Testaments, religious and secular papers, which the Japanese officials freely permit to be given to the prisoners. He incloses a translation of a letter from L. de Bagretzoff, lieutenant of Cossacks, in behalf of his comrades, for reading matter. The lieutenant writes: "The reading of them gives us much material for work, for many among us prisoners are studying the English language. The Bible above all is received with the most sincere gratitude."

L. L., Pawtucket, R. I. Where or how did the term, "flotsam and jetsam" originate?

It is from two words, flotan (Saxon) to float, and jeter (French) to throw out. It means that which has been thrown overboard and is floating on the tide.

F. L., DesMoines, Ia. What proportion of our population goes to college?

A writer in the Chautauquan says: "There are 472 colleges in the United States, eleven of them founded before the Revolution, half of them founded since the Civil War. In these colleges there were, in 1897, 84,955, and in 1902, 88,879 students pursuing college courses, about five-eighths of whom were male students. This means roughly, that out of every 900 of the population, one is a college student; and that in every 1,400 of the population there is one male college student."

Mrs. Lucy B., Cherry Creek, N. Y., writes:

I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for about three years. I am sixty-six years old, live in the country, and am not able to go out but very little in the winter, and I wait with joy the coming of the HERALD every Thursday. It gives an idea of what is going on in the whole world, and such grand sermons.

W. E. L., Willington, S. C. In which way can a pastor or minister of the Gospel do the most good, in the pulpit or out of it?

Preaching is only a part, and by no means the largest part, of a minister's duties. His best opportunities may be found in the influence he exerts in his parish, in his pastoral visits, his Christian counsel and advice with young and old, strengthening the weak, cheering the afflicted, and coming closer to his people's hearts, in their homes and at prayer meetings, than he can possibly do by any sermon. There are some, however, who are stronger and more efficient in the pulpit than in the pastoral field, and this is usually the case in large cities. It depends, therefore, upon the man himself, and his opportunities and surroundings, how the question should be answered.

C. G. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. Who is the author of the following:

"So here hath been dawning
Another blue day;
Think, wilt thou let it
Slip useless away"?

Also—"I shot an arrow into the air"?

The first lines are by Carlyle, the second by Longfellow, under the title of "The Arrow and the Song."

Mrs. A. B. H., Wapello, Ia. Kindly describe the "Resurrection-plant," where grown, its uses, etc.?

The term "Resurrection-plant," as applied to any one of several hygroscopic plants, which, when dry and apparently dead, revive as soon as moistened. Especially: 1. A Mexican plant (Selaginella lepidophylla), of the club-moss family (Lycopodiaceæ). 2. The rose of Jericho (Anastatica hierochuntina). 3. A fig marigold (Mesembryanthemum Tripolium). There has been a good deal printed in recent years about a humbug "Resurrection Plant," sold by pedlers and others throughout the country. You should deal with some florist.

C. B. D., Latrobe, Pa. Can you inform me how many immigrants arrived in this country during the last six months, and what proportion of them were Russians?

During the six months ending Feb. 28 of this year, more than 400,000 immigrants arrived in the different ports of the United States. This is a gain of thirty-two per cent over the corresponding period of last year. The arrivals from Russia during the six months ending Feb. 28 numbered some 84,000 persons, being an increase of seventy-two per cent. over the same period in 1903. The tremendous gain is accounted for by the war with Japan; thousands of Russians fleeing from their native country to escape service with the army in the Far East.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT SPEAKING AT AUSTIN, TEXAS

President Roosevelt, during the early part of the month, took an extended hunting trip. On April 9, he and his party were in camp at Panther Springs, on Deep Red River, fourteen miles east of Frederick, Okla., where they remained for nearly a week, hunting on a tract of land thirty-six miles square. Five Texas saddle-horses were used by the hunters and greyhounds and stag-hounds in running down the wolves and jack-rabbits. On the last day the party bagged eighteen wolves and much smaller game. After leaving Oklahoma, the President took train for Colorado, where he intended to hunt large game in the Rockies. He is accompanied by Dr. A. T. Lambert, of New York; Philip B. Stewart, of Colorado Springs; John Goff and Jake Borah (two guides), two coolies, and other servants. There will be no formal ceremonies at any point and as little speech-making as possible, the President desiring to enjoy his holiday quietly. He spoke at some few points at the beginning of his vacation journey. When the hunting trip is over he will return to Washington and take his family to Oyster Bay, N. Y., for the summer.

Miscellaneous

Wm. L., Idaho Falls. Your questions are wholly outside of our range.

Reader, Claysville, Ky. No such words are to be found in the Bible.

S. J. T., New York. We have heard nothing of Jack the Boy Preacher recently.

E. P. S., Union Church, Pa. 1. Never heard of it. 2. Write to American Agriculturist, New York City.

Mrs. J. B. Hyzer, 314 So. Jackson Street, Janesville, Wis., wishes to get the words of the poem beginning: "I have a never-failing bank." Some reader may possibly be able to send them.

Mrs. Rachel A. C. Root, Vincennes, Ind., has received from CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, over 250 copies of the hymn, "How tedious and tasteless the hours," in response to her application. She desires to thank the senders.

Mrs. K. S. Stokke, Missionary, Runing Fu., Honan, China, via. Hankow, can use S. S. cards and good pictures in her religious work among the native children. Readers sending such gifts should mark them as "printed matter."

M. M., Medina, N. Y. 1. Card games should not be patronized by professing Christians, Even if they are not a means of gambling, they should be condemned for the sake of others who may be influenced by our example. 2. The Bible does not prohibit meat as food.

Mrs. E. O., Tippecanoe City, O. 1. Any recent encyclopedia will give the facts concerning ex-King Milan, the murdered King Alexander, and the present King Peter of Servia. 2. The outline of Pliny's career may also be found there. He was a famous author and historian of the first century.

Mrs. A. R. G., Valentine, Neb. Although it is true there are many good people outside of the Church, it is the duty of every Christian, as far as possible, to take his stand openly for Christ, along with the great army of believers. This he can best accomplish by uniting with the Church, and availing himself of its peculiar privileges. We are enjoined not to neglect the ordinances of religion. By staying out of the Church he is surely a straggler behind the great Christian army, when he should be a member, marching under its flag and yielding loyal respect to its organization like a true "soldier of the Cross."

MEXICAN HALF-BREED PEONS

A MEXICAN FLOWER MARKET

RANCHMAN AND DAUGHTER

THE FEAST OF A HUNDRED DAYS

WE have traversed Mexico from north to south—in out-of-the-way places, on horseback, in populous parts by trains that carried us 10,000 feet in the mountain air, and set us down at our present altitude of 5,000 feet—all at the time when the whole nation joins in the annual gaieties and religious festivities. During the three months and ten days preceding Easter the entire population enjoys high carnival, and the period is known as "the Feast of a Hundred Days," or "the Hundred-Day Fiesta." All the larger towns are called, "Seats of Carnival" and the inhabitants of the villages flock into these headquarters of merriment.

Sunday is the chief day for the festive pre-Easter gatherings. Everybody goes to church in the morning, after which the people enjoy themselves at bull fights, cocking-mains and gambling. The nearest American counterpart of the scene is circus day in a rural district. The majority of the people are Roman Catholics, of course; and the "after church" scenes in Mexico are not materially different from those in all Spanish-American countries at this season.

While on our horseback ride from the Rio Grande, we camped one night in an old stone house with barred windows, closely resembling a jail; and when we awoke we had the surprise of our lives. The day before had been warm and sunny. The morning, however, was bitterly cold, and I suffered more than on the journey through frozen Finland in the winter of 1903. We had no water. We could not make coffee, for all the creeks and barrels of water in the neighborhood were frozen.

On the creek near our camping-place, half-breed Mexicans of the lowest class, dark as negroes, gathered in a body. In awe they stared at the frozen waters, for they were looking upon ice for the first time in their lives. They tested that miraculous crust with their feet, with their hands. Then wrapping their gay, thin blankets about them, they fled back to their straw-thatched huts. Fires, worthy of the name, they had none. The Mexican in that arid region knows of no fuel greater than mere twigs.

Their greatest grievance, however, was that they could not join in the fiesta celebration that had been planned for that Sunday. In a primitive arena, there was to have been a bull-fight, with amateur matadors; cock-fights and gambling games. All these entertainments were called off, and, instead of being in a district where all life is out-of-doors, we seemed now to be in an uninhabited land. Even the village church was a place deserted. We stepped within the little edifice, and found the priests saying mass to empty pews. Within these stone walls it was far colder than outdoors. We got on horseback and galloped to the town of Sabinas, on the Mexican National Railway. In Sabinas, there was a Protestant Church, side by side with a Catholic Cathedral. At eleven o'clock service was held, attended, as usual, by the more than twenty Protestants of the town. The congregation, as if expecting such a cold Sunday, had provided the little building with a wood stove. The Rev. Mr. Williams, from San Antonio, Texas, preached the sermon. "Tempering the wind to the shorn lamb," was his subject. After the service was over, we told Mr. Williams that we felt that we were truly "shorn lambs," as we had believed we were in a country of perpetual sunshine, and had brought no warm clothing. He at once took us to the house of a friend, with whom he was staying, and there we were given a hot dinner and speeded on our way rejoicing.

THE "WHITE HOUSE" OF MEXICO

"I come over here to preach once a month," said Mr. Williams. "You see, the great-one-million-acre ranch owners in this vicinity let out their farms, and some of the lessees are Americans. Then, too, there are a number of Americans in business; and for their benefit I give my time and my services. This afternoon I go to another town on the other side of this big ranch; and next Sunday I repeat the process in two other places. I have no church in San Antonio, but I do this work gladly, that I have found in nearby Mexico. All through this country you will find American Protestant ministers doing just what I am doing. We receive no salary, and expect none."

OLD PALACE BUILT BY CORTEZ

What Mr. Williams told us of other American pastors in Mexico, was later brought to our notice elsewhere than in a church. At the "carnival times," we almost invariably found itinerant pastors holding informal out-door services. Sometimes they took their stand right outside the bull-ring, or at the gates of the place where cock-fights were being held. Also in the plazas, in the very midst of the myriad of gaming tables, they would start a hymn or begin a simple talk, joined very soon by a listening, respectful crowd.

On the Tuesday following the bitterly cold Sunday, we broke camp and

WASH DAY IN A MEXICAN HOME

MAKING "DRAWN-WORK"

A HOUSE SAID TO HAVE BEEN ERECTED BY CORTEZ

rode southward, and once again we found the sun shining every moment of the day, and lived outdoors in comfort, in true Mexican style. We passed through village after village, meeting invariably with the most courteous welcome. Not all the villages were of the straw-and-grass variety. In the more progressive places, where the peons earn fifty cents a day,the houses are built of adobe (bricks made of ordinary mud). Even in these more progressive places, the peons are about as lazy and shiftless as the negroes of the West Indies. They never hunt, for they cannot afford the shells for a shotgun; they never fish, for none can afford to buy tackle. They love best to sit on the sunny side of their adobe dwellings, and smoke the everlasting cigarettes, working only when actually confronted by starvation. These peons are half Indian; and, though having distinct traces of the Aztec in their faces, are a very low type of humanity. Educated Mexicans call this class of peons, "Blanket Indians," from the fact that, winter or summer, they wear a bright-hued blanket around their shoulders.

We visited a school on one of the ranches, supported one-half by the ranch-owner and one-half by the Government, as is the custom throughout the country. The peon children sang national airs for our benefit. But one and all sang through the folds of the blanket held close to the mouth. As for education, for every village that boasted of a school, we passed through a dozen where not a person could read or write. It must be remembered, however, that this does not apply to South Mexico, where, in the populous districts, education is compulsory; but solely to the little-known northern region along the Rio Grande, far from railways. This region is seldom visited by Americans, other than the preachers before referred to, and never by tourists. Yet, we found men possessing the highest education, sons of ranch-owners who had "finished" in Paris or Berlin. Often the management of the great ranches was in the hands of graduates of the Mexican University at Chapultepec, the West Point of Mexico. Captain Garcia, for example, the manager of the Trerino Ranch, the biggest ranch in Mexico, having over 1,500,000 acres, was an engineer in the Mexican army and a graduate of Chapultepec.

One of the conditions that impressed us was the absolute safety with which the solitary traveler can traverse the wildest section. For in these rural regions one meets everywhere with members of the finest body of men in all Mexico—the rural police. They always travel in pairs. Fifty miles from the railway we would come across them, patrolling their districts. Within an hour after we made a new camp, no matter where, a couple of Rurales would ride up. They assured us that we need fear nothing, as they and their companions were riding constantly within rifle shot. Many a deed of bravery is credited to these Rurales. Not long ago, that part of Mexico bordering on the Rio Grande was infested with smugglers; but the Rurales waged constant war with them, and now traveling in that country is as safe as walking on an avenue of the city of Mexico.

One of the last villages we passed through on our horseback ride was entirely deserted. We entered one straw hut after another, and not a soul was to be found. At the other end of the village street suddenly two horsemen appeared, the rural policemen of course. "Where is everybody?" we asked. "Gone, senors, gone to the big town yonder to make merry and to honor the great Hidalgo." This was not only a Sunday of the Fiesta, but a birthday of the great father of Mexican independence.

Thus the "Hundred Day Fiesta" was constantly brought to our notice—a fiesta half religious, half patriotic. Some days after the visit to the deserted village we were in Chihuahua, where the great martyr-priest Hidalgo was shot. In Chihuahua they spoke of Hidalgo as one living instead of as a man who ninety-five years ago marshaled the people of his village, and struck the first blow for Mexican independence. We stepped into the church where he ministered. It was one suffocating mass of flowers. "We keep it flower-covered always like this," said the sexton, "during the hundred days of Fiesta." Flowers were everywhere in that part of Mexico. We could have bought a whole canoe-load of gorgeous lilies and water hyacinths for twent five cents, and this is the usual condition of the flow market.

The further we got into the warm zone, the merri were the festivities of the Fiesta. It seemed as if eve living peon, who had nothing else to do, was selli flowers or images of saints on the plazas. Out in t open the weavers of matting and rugs sat at their pri itive looms. Indoors, in half the households of t section, the women were busy making Mexican draw work. If there's one thing that delights the heart the American lady tourist in Mexico, it is drawn-wor There are filmy collars and doilies as fine as cobweb handkerchiefs with borders so fine as to seem woven strands of thin air. The women who make these fen nine trifles receive only twelve and a half cents a da while the product of their day's work brings three four dollars.

Having completed the long horseback ride through region in which we had seen Mexican life in its mo primitive form, we took train to the capital, there to se by comparison, Mexican life in a more advanced for

In our look about the streets we saw some strang sights. There were no delivery wagons, everything b ing delivered by hand. In the principal square, side b side with the blue painted carriages of the rich, we the two-wheeled pulque carts and caravans of woolly do keys, whose backs were piled high with chickens. In t plazas were public letter-writers. It is the custom he that when two men friends meet in the public stre they embrace each other affectionately; while women ki one another twice on each cheek. Even the curio sho have strange names. One is named "The Trip to Glory, another "Hallelujah." Every Mexican passing by th Cathedral, with its foundation of heathen idols, lifts h hat. The men wear the biggest hats in the world, ou side of Corea; while the women never wear any kind head-covering from the cradle to the grave. The Mex can man regards his hat as his dearest possession, nex to his horse. The ordinary citizen thinks nothing paying forty dollars for his sombrero, but he wears i the rest of his life.

THEIR SEA-TRIP ON THE "SYLPH"

MRS. ROOSEVELT, with the children, Miss Ethel, Kermit, and Archie, recently returned to Washington from a very enjoyable yachting trip on board the President's yacht, the Sylph. After an uneventful journey from Washington by rail, the party arrived in Jacksonville, Fla., where they were met by Senator Taliaferro and wife, who invited the party to sojourn at the Taliaferro home for the night; but this invitation was declined, as the boys, Kermit and Archie, were in such a hurry to board the Sylph, that Mrs. Roosevelt did not feel like making them wait any longer than was necessary.

Kermit carried a gun, and remarked as he shouldered it, "I brought this gun along to shoot alligators with. Are there any here?"

Mrs. Roosevelt wished to take a sea-trip, and also to go up the St. John's River, where Kermit could find alligators to shoot. The party were late in arriving in Jacksonville, as the train was delayed; but this did not dampen th enthusiasm regarding the trip, whic was shared by all.

Senator Frye, of Maine, was on of the party, as were also Dr. Rixey and Lieut. F. T. Evans, who com manded the yacht. The children an their mother, on their return to th White House, showed unmistakably the benefit they had derived fro their pleasant trip. The children were tanned and ruddy, and their merry laughter, once more echoing through the corridors and rooms of the Executive Mansion, told the story of their abounding spirits and happy childhood. There are no statistics recording the number of alligators shot by Kermit.

Very Much Pleased

I write to let you know that I received the Crown Dictionary all right, and will say that I am very much pleased, and it is all it is represented to be. Have shown it to a number of my friends, who pronounce it to be a very fine thing. MAGGIE E. LAIRD.

THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE IN INDIA

SIMLA, WHERE MANY EARTHQUAKE SHOCKS WERE FELT

MUSSOORIE, IN THE HIMALAYA VALLEY, WHERE MANY PERISHED

LATER reports from India fully confirm the news published in these columns last week, of the loss of life by the earthquake on April 4. No such calamity has occurred there within the memory of any living person. The official figures estimate the number of deaths at 13,000, but as communication has been interrupted between Bombay and the stricken region, it is feared that when complete returns are made, it will be found that not less than 20,000 persons perished.

The earthquake originated in the Western Himalaya Mountains, the vibration traveling from west to east. There was a succession of shocks, lasting several minutes. At Mussoorie, eleven distinct shocks were counted, and while the disturbance continued no one could stand, and even persons squatting on the ground, in the India fashion, were overturned. It was preceded by a reverberation resembling the report of artillery among the mountains. Persons who were in bed at the time, describe the motion as like that of a ship at sea in a storm. The mountains heaved and swayed for a full minute. Traders using the Himalayan route to Tibet say that a volcano has developed on the Tibetan frontier, which is emitting flame and smoke. This would indicate widespread volcanic activity.

Besides Lahore, a picture of which appeared in our pages last week, the towns of Dharmsala, Amritsar, Palampur, Mussoorie, Rawalpindi, and Kandra, suffered severely. In the ancient city of Delhi the shocks were exceedingly violent, and all through Kashmir the damage has been very heavy. The whole Kangra Valley, a district north of Lahore, with an area of eight thousand square miles, with a population of 800,000, was devastated, and in the town of Kangra scarcely a building remains standing. One of the famous Gurkha regiments was stationed there. Though the barracks they occupied was of massive stone, it was literally lifted two feet from its foundations, and fell in a heap of ruins, burying over four hundred men and women under the stones. At first the spectators were too paralyzed by fear to render assistance, but when their panic passed, they set vigorously to work to lift the masses of masonry. Two hundred persons were extricated, but many of them were so badly crushed that they are not expected to live. A peculiarly sad incident also at Kangra, was the fall of the Church Missionary Society's house. Three of the missionaries, Rev. H. F. Rowland, Mrs. Daeuble and Miss Lorbeer, were crushed to death in the ruins. It is reported that not more than five hundred persons in Kangra, out of a population of five thousand, escaped destruction.

At Dharmsala, the native quarter was obliterated entirely, and three-fourths of the people perished. The European section of the town was also stricken, and some thirty persons and seven children were killed. The telegraph station was destroyed, but the news was carried to Lahore by native survivors, who were almost too agitated by their experience to tell the story. They said that the shocks were so sudden and violent that the people could not escape from their houses. Some were crushed on the thresholds as they rushed into the open air.

At Simla, the summer resort to which the Viceroy and his household, and the chief officers of the Government go at this period of the year for the benefit of the cool breezes, the earthquake did considerable damage. The Viceregal Lodge itself suffered injury. Lady Curzon, the wife of the Viceroy, who was formerly Miss Leiter of Chicago, had a narrow escape. One of the chimneys of the house was thrown down, and crashed through the roof, destroying a bed in the room over the one in which Lady Curzon was sleeping. The building was so shaken as to be unsafe for occupation, and the family will have to use a temporary abode while their official residence is rebuilt.

Dr. R. A. Hume, the eminent missionary of Ahmednagar, who, as our readers will remember, rendered valuable service during the famine, is now in this country for rest and recuperation. On the occasion of a recent visit to this office, he remarked in reference to the earthquake: "The region chiefly affected is comparatively thinly settled. It is a tea-growing country, and except in a few cities like Lahore, the inhabitants are scattered. Had the earthquake reached the great cities, the catastrophe would have been terrible. Happily the suburbs of Simla, to which missionaries go for recovery after sickness or overwork, appear to have escaped altogether." The possibility that some American missionaries might have been injured whose names were not mentioned in the dispatches, was, however, a cause for anxiety. It has been relieved by a cable message from Missionary J. C. Ewing, who is familiar with the whole of that section. He cables as follows:

HOW HE CAME INTO THE KINGDOM

A LETTER received from the present pastor of my first church, giving an account of its fiftieth anniversary celebration, recalls a remarkable conversion in that field of labor. As I recall the facts they are as follows: Barney C. was the owner of a forty-acre tract of land not far from the church. During my pastorate, up to the time of his conversion, Barney had never attended religious services. His wife and children occasionally attended the Sunday School and preaching. Barney was a man of most determined spirit, very profane, who neither feared God nor regarded the opinion of his neighbors.

Toward the close of my first year's work, God most graciously poured out the Holy Spirit upon the congregation. Barney's wife was attending the meetings, and to our joy, one evening, she came forward and took a place among the "seekers." The next day, accompanied by one of the officers of the church, I started out to make calls, and nearing Barney's house, we concluded to stop and see Mrs. C. As we approached the door, who should we see sitting at the window smoking, and sharpening a large butcher knife, but Barney.

Having expressed joy at seeing the wife come forward the previous evening, and hearing her reply, "I am glad that I was led to take a decided stand for Jesus," I turned toward the husband, and said, "Mr. C., I wish it were so with you." In a moment, with an eye flashing as with fire, still holding the knife in his hand, he fiercely stared at me and said, "Have you come here to get me to come to your church?" I replied, "No! We have called to encourage your wife in the stand she took last night for Jesus." Then followed another outburst of wrath, ending with the inquiry, "Do you think you can convert me?" His wife, as if strengthened for the occasion, replied, "No, husband; but God can." As if a bullet had pierced his heart he became silent as death. Soon after we arose to take our leave, when the wife asked if I would not offer a prayer. We all knelt in prayer. I offered a simple, brief prayer, perhaps the only one he had ever heard in his house, and when we arose, he came over to where we stood, put one arm around my neck, and the other around the neck of my elder, burst into tears, and crying constantly was scarcely able to give utterance to his words, said: "I have been fighting against God ever since the meetings began; I would not go to the meetings; but unknown to my wife and children, I have spent the evenings in reading the Bible and praying; I give up! I will come to the meeting to-night, and from now on will, with my wife, serve the Lord."

That evening I went early to the church, and on reaching the door, there stood Barney, his wife, two sons, and daughter anxiously waiting. The meetings ended with an ingathering of nearly fifty souls; and at the first communion after the meetings, more than thirty stood up, making public confession. Among them were Barney C., his wife, two sons, a daughter, and a sister-in-law, all of whom, after their baptism, were received into the little church.

The Lesson of the Flowers

TEXT: MATT. 6: 28

"Consider the lilies of the field"

"LILIES! 'Consider the lilies of the field!' No one can understand what that command means, unless that person has attended an Easter service in Southern California, as I have done," said a dear friend to me many years ago. "Why, in Los Angeles and Pasadena, they do not grow the spring lilies as hothouse plants, as they do in Chicago or New York. They do not look upon the pistil of a calla lily as though it were a pencil of solid gold, and charge eight, or ten, or twelve, or even fifteen dollars per dozen for their ascension lilies. But there the lilies grow almost as plentifully as do the thistles on Scottish moors, or the shamrocks on Ireland's hills. There all the ministers have to do to insure Easter decoration for their churches, is to ask the members of their congregations to bring in their lilies the Saturday before Easter Sunday. And what is the result? The lilies are brought by the armful and in carriage loads. The only way I can describe their abundance, is to compare them to the golden-rods and the bluebells and the daisies and the dandelions growing in Eastern fields in the summer-time. The Easter pulpits are crowded with them. The organ-lofts are crowded with them. They hang over the galleries. They entwine themselves about the church columns. The Sunday School rooms, as well as the main auditoriums, are filled with them. Lilies, lilies, lilies everywhere! Oh, you ought to go to Southern California to see the churches decorated with lilies on Easter Sunday! Nowhere is another sight like it!"

California's Wealth of Lilies

When my friend spoke thus, I was not a sceptic. I did not ridicule her statements. I had never been in Southern California at that time, but I had traveled around the world, and I had seen the almost limitless wealth of the wild flora of the tropics. In Honolulu, we were welcomed by friends, who came down to greet us, with thousands upon thousands of flowers. They entwined them in our horses' hair and harness. They covered our carriages with them. They placed them in garlands about our necks. They tossed them under our feet in the streets. But notwithstanding my experience in the East, I was unable to realize the beauty of an Easter Sunday in Southern California, until I, myself, had participated in such a service. No man can appreciate the beauty of a Los Angeles church, until he sees there a church building literally covered with pure white lilies. Not a red leaf there. Only the white leaf, and the green leaf, side by side. The lilies seemed not to be lilies, but great curtains and crosses and columns of white. On my first Easter service, the people brought so many lilies for decorating purposes, that the ladies could not use them all. Great piles of these white lilies had been thrown away as useless. Why did we not send some of these lilies to other churches? That would have been a foolish waste of time. All the other churches had just as many lilies on hand as we had.

Oriental Wild Flowers

Beautiful and abundant as are the lilies of Southern California; appropriate as they are as symbols of Christ's resurrection, I would not limit our thoughts to them on this Easter morning. It was not of such flowers as these, alone, that Christ referred to when he bade us consider the lilies. The lily of Christ's time was not, as many suppose, like the lily of the Western world. It was not the calla lily, with its cornucopia leaf and long pistil of gold; not the lily of the valley, which looks like a string of bells, ready to ring out the Easter chimes; not the Bermuda lily, with its clapper of white, nor the water lily, lifting its head above the river Nile, to be decapitated and pounded into flour, as the modern husbandman makes his wheat. Nor was it the Hulch lily, which Dr. Thomson, the Oriental traveler, describes as of such velvety softness, that the finest silk could not be softer. The New Testament lily was a name given comprehensively to all the wild flowers of Palestine, as the name "sparrow" embraced all the small birds that winged their way above the Judean hills. Thus, as my Easter text, "Consider the lilies," embraces all wild flowers, I shall not hem in and circumscribe my subject by the beautiful lilies which we find decorating our churches this Easter day. In the symbol of the growth of the wild flower, I shall try to find some practical Gospel lesson appropriate for this glorious service of Easter morn.

The wild flowers of Palestine, in the first place, teach us that man, insignificant though he is, is nurtured and protected by a divine Father's care, no matter where he may be; they teach us that if God takes the trouble to plant and develop a little wild flower, God is certainly willing to care for and does care for us. One day the great "Wizard of Abbotsford" was found in a Scottish ravine, down on his knees, with paper and pencil, drawing the construction of the leaf of a wild flower. Some one said to him, "Sir Walter, why are you spending your time thus?" "Ah," answered Sir Walter Scott, "I am studying for me, in His care for this little wild flower. If God is willing to take the time to color this little leaf, and place in it veins and arteries as perfect in construction as are the veins of my own body; if He is at pains to warm this leaf into life, and feed it and give it drink, surely God is willing to care, and does care for me, whom he has made in his own divine image." Was not Walter Scott's answer right? Can we not find the love of God for man demonstrated in God's care for the wild flower of Palestine, which Christ called lilies? Indeed, on this day, I go further than this: I assert that no man can fully realize the love and tenderness of God unless he has seen them pictorialized on the leaves of the wild flowers. The poet-preacher, Henry Ward Beecher, said, "I do not believe that any one can fully read the natural world who does not read the Bible, and I am satisfied that no one can read the Bible to the best advantage, who does not read the natural world a great deal. These things are very much to each other what blossom is to fruit and what germ is to blossom. One, if not the cause of the other, helps to produce it. And so these two revelations, the external and the internal, work together and both work for the same purpose."

"The Love of My Maker

God's Care for the Flowers

Can you not see God's love and care for you in the looms which weave together a rose leaf? In the strength of the honeysuckle, which lifts itself above the ground, clambering over the sides of a wall, or a porch, in order to reach the light of the sun? Can you not find God's protection hovering over you in the bristling thorns of the bush, which guard the wild flower from the reckless touch of an approaching foe? Can you not fathom God's care for you, by studying the roots that suck up the strength out of the ground and the marvelous chemistry which can gather out of the same black soil, the red for the azalea, the purple for the daffodil, the blue for the heliotrope, the lavender for the hyacinth, the pink for the carnation, and the white for the lily? Though there are millions and millions of wild flowers every spring and summer; though the fields may be covered with dandelions and daisies, and sunflowers and golden-rod, yet each individual flower shows God's tender care, whether it be the trailing arbutus, hiding in the mountains, or the sweet mignonette and the bluebells and the forget-me-nots, and all the frailer floral beauties, which are grown in the greenhouses of the horticulturists. If God cares for the inanimate things of this world, for the many weeds like the thistles, which the farmer tries to destroy. If God cares for the daisies, which cannot speak; for the moonflowers, which only bloom at night; for the sensitive plants, so sensitive that at the least rough shaking of the winds, their petals will fly shut; for the pollen, which is tossed in the air by the summer breezes, that rose may be married to rose, aster to aster, mignonette to mignonette, clematis to clematis—surely God does care for immortal man, for whom Christ was born and Christ died and Christ was resurrected on Easter day. Yes, God does care for you, though you have been an invalid for the last twenty years. He does care for you, though a widow, and seemingly facing a life of financial struggle, with a large brood of little ones at your back. He cares for you though you seem, at this moment, not to have a friend in all the wide, wide world. He cares for you, I know it. This Easter day Christ says, "Consider the wild flowers of the fiel As I have cared for the lilies, so I am caring for y oh, ye of little faith."

No, no. Christ honors the wild flower because it willing to do the work of a wild flower, as we should willing to do the work for which we were created, a not for our attempting to do the work which it is i possible for us to do. And yet, as I wander in a out among these Easter lilies, how often do I find m trying to win the divine commendation, "Well do thou good and faithful servant," when they have n glected the work which God has given them to do, a have been trying ten, twenty, thirty years to do soi work for which they were never fitted. They are n willing to do simple work like that of the wild flowe the simple, beautifully-colored sweet-scented wi flowers. They are always trying for some position th cannot attain. They are always dissatisfied with wh they are. Here, for instance, is a young woman. S has a good, ordinary, every-day brain. She is a wi and a mother. But instead of staying at home a looking after the children, and sharing her husbanc sorrows and cares, she feels she must be a Joan of Ar or a Frances E. Willard, or a Jenny Lind. She is pe suaded she has the talent. She has had visions in re erence to her "true career." No one can dissuade h from this idea. So she runs around hither and thithe and absolutely fritters away her life in trying to be a ced of Lebanon, when God wanted her to be a wild flowe

A Lesson of Contentment

Here is a man who is a good, ordinary, every-da simple preacher. If he would only be satisfied in th position God had assigned him, he would be mightil blessed. But he wants to be a cedar of Lebanon. H wants to be a Savonarola, a Thomas Chalmers or a Joh Knox. Or he hears some of the great evangelists of th world, and immediately he decides on going over int Macedonia to help the English, or the Scotch, or th Welsh, or the Australians. And what is the result. H ruins his life for good, because he is not willing to be simple wild-flower in God's service.

Never despise your humble position in life, becaus you are like the simple wild-flowers. When the Secon Advent comes, and Jesus, as the Divine Bridegroom goes down among the Easter lilies or the wild-flowers the Lord will not say unto the multitude of his children "Did you occupy a great position in life? Were you noted general, or king, or statesman? Like Hannal More, did you wield a brilliant pen? Like Madam d Recamier, did you have a salon filled with the leadin thinkers of your land?" He will say, however, "Di you nestle, as a clover-top, among the green grasses, a I commanded you? Did you lighten the sick-room o some invalid when, at my command, the messenge plucked you? Did you breathe out your fragranc upon the coffin-lid, while the minister uttered the com mittal, 'Ashes to ashes, dust to dust?' Did you mak the marriage altar sweeter and holier when the young girl plucked you in the fields, and with your bright faces decorated the village church on the wedding-day? Did you carry the message of love between the angry brothers and sisters and friends who had quarreled? I made you wild-flowers. I loved you because you were wild flowers. As Easter lilies, did you love and honor me?"

Trust in Providence

Another Easter lesson. After we have done our best, then, like the wild-flowers, let us trust God that he will do what is best for us. After we have done our best, we have no more right to worry about our future than the wild-flowers have to worry where they are going to get a drink, or from what quarter their daily meals are to come, or where they are to find their sunshine, or their nights in which to sleep. I find all the more justification in the use of this figure, because at time it seems to me that flowers, after all, are not mere inanimate objects, but have a certain intelligence of their own. They seem to me at times to be almost human in their desires.

What would you think if all the wild flowers on the Jerusalem hills, on the morning of the blackest of all Black Fridays in the world's history, began to weep and to cry, and to beg. Supposing that we should hear em begin to moan? "What is the matter? What is e matter? Why is that great crowd surging forth om yonder gates to crush us and trample our petals the dust? Why is this darkness over the whole rth? It is not yet night. Is the end of the world at nd? Oh God, why are those rocks swaying under- ath us as a cradle would rock under a mother's touch? hy this awful light in the Garden, on this early Easter orn?" If ever there was a time when flowers could en their lips and speak, it must have been then when eir Maker suffered. But not with such words would ey have broken their silence. I can imagine their eeting as the Saviour stepped among them that morn- g in the garden of Joseph of Arimathea. Sweet and autiful must they have looked to him, and I can im- ine his saying to them, "Swing your incense, wild owers; swing it far and near. Hold high your chal- e filled with sweetest of nectar, that every passing mming-bird may have his fill. And then, don't worry, it trust me. Just trust me." And if the wild flowers ust God for food and drink and sleep, cannot we do e same?

Trust Christ, as do the wild flowers. Oh, why can- t we do it! What a blessed peace this trust would ean to our tired hearts. The other day, I was riding t to a cemetery with a gentleman, who was one of e pall-bearers of the funeral we were following. He ld me his age. In great amazement, I said, "Why, u do not look nearly as old as that. What is your nacea of perpetual youth?" "Well," he answered, "I do not know of any, except one. I trust God. Because I fully trust Him, I never worry. I always go to bed early, and get eight or nine full hours' sleep. Then, when I get up in the morning, I say to myself, 'Now, with God's help, I will do the best, the very best I can.' Then, if I have done my best, and things do not come out as I wish, why, it is God's lookout, and not mine. I know He loves me better than I love myself. Why should I grumble if He has a better plan for me than I have thought out?"

The Easter lilies teach us that a short earthly life is not necessarily an unimportant life. Even though our loved ones were with us but a few years, the influence of those years, both for them and us, may reach on through the eternities. Their lives and our lives, may be as short as the shortest-lived of the wild flowers, and yet the eternities themselves will never be able to outlive them and us in our heavenly joys.

The God of the heavenly garden sometimes gives his sweetest perfumes and most exquisite garments, to those of his floral children who may be called the transient beauties of this world. To some of us, our earthly lives may be as short as those of the passing flowers. The night-blooming cereus blossoms but once a year. About nine o'clock at night, this beautiful flower, with its rim of most delicate pink and its white centre, opens. In three hours the flower is dead. The midnight tolls its knell. The night-blooming cereus, although nine inches in diameter, dies of old age, after it has had but three short hours of maturity. The marvels of Peru, better known by the name of the four o'clocks, were the little flowers dearly cherished by our grandmothers. They open late every afternoon, just at four o'clock. In olden days, these flowers were far more to be trusted as timepieces than the ancient wooden clocks of the quaint farmhouses. These flowers die a short time after the sun has set. Nearly all wild flowers live but a few days at most. Snowdrops fade almost as quickly as a snowdrop melts away. The trailing arbutus shivers in the cold of spring, and soon catches pneumonia and dies. The biographies of nearly all plants can be written in the few words with which Jesus described the life of a lily, as "the grass of the field, which to-day is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven." The heat of the sun may both incubate floral life and cremate the shriveled corpse in the same day.

But though man's life, like the lilies, may be very short, his heavenly life—the resurrection life—is very long. Christ was only thirty-three years of age when he was crucified. But Christ is to-day dwelling in heaven with our dear ones who have gone beyond. Mother, by the grave of your little baby, I declare it. Husband, by the grave of your dead wife, believe it. Child, by the casket of your father and mother, welcome this resurrection truth. Our dear ones' earthly lives may have ended, but their heavenly lives have just begun. Oh, on this glorious Easter morn will you accept this truth? By placing your hope in Christ, who bids you trust him, as do the lilies of the field, will you not grasp the promise of a heavenly resurrection?

Taking Tea in Chinatown

FRIENDS of the New York Foreigners' Mission were recently bidden to a reception held by the mission workers in a restaurant in Mott Street, in the very heart of that part of Manhattan popularly known as Chinatown. A pleasant and unique programme was enjoyed by the guests, Miss Helen F. Clark, the director of the mission, being the leading spirit in the affair, which began with stereopticon views of life in China, followed by scenes of Chinese life in New York.

From worship in a gorgeous temple of idolatry in a athen city, to a plain little Christian mission room in ew York, is a far cry; but there are many grateful hinese in the metropolis who have been won to Chris- nity, and are now as faithful in attendance on the use of the Christian's God as they formerly were in eir sacrifices and ceremonials before their curious and ntastic native shrines.

The restaurant was especially decorated r the occasion, and the effect was gorge- s in the extreme. All the place was low with light, and color. Beautiful ken stuffs, rich with embroidery, draped trances and exits. Electric lights shone rough clusters of many-hued flowers, ade of transparent glass and silk. Ban- rs hung from different angles in the oms, while upon the walls were numerous ctures, appearing to have been painted th the finest of brushes, but which, upon oser examination, proved to be products the needle. Tables of teakwood, carved d inlaid with pearl, held the odd table rvice used in this unique place. Visitors the little rooms, partially partitioned d screened from the large salon, were ated in chairs beautifully embroidered ith rich colors upon a red satin ground. here were miniature gardens filled with ny trees and brilliant shrubs, among hich wandered pigmy figures of mandar- s and their attendants. These scenes were t in deep frames at an elevation, and roduced a very realistic effect when ewed from the proper distance and angle. adies in Japanese costume (these were e mission workers), and ladies in Euro- an dress (these were Chinese), moved nong the guests, welcoming them with easant words and smiles.

One could not help wishing that the inty little feminine Orientals had worn eir own becoming costumes. The American ladies lost nothing by donning the richly-embroidered Chinese robes; but the little yellow women, in spite of their sweet faces and sloe-black eyes and hair, parted with much of their native attractiveness when they dressed themselves in shirt-waist suits with waists tightly girdled, their heads surmounted with hats whose brims stood a foot above the high-rolled dusky pompadours.

Among the chief attractions of the evening were the little Chinese children, who mingled among the guests with quiet unconcern, and, truth to say, were much better behaved than most American children when allowed to participate in such functions. One little fellow, who in spite of his pink-and-white-gingham "Buster Brown" suit, was distinctly Oriental, seemed in great danger of being spoiled, for no sooner would he escape from one admirer, than he was captured by another; when he grew tired he would seek out his mother, who would retire with him to a little ante-room, where a watchful eye might have seen her brushing the wonderful black and shining hair of the little fellow, until it glistened like a crow's wing in the sun. Some of the little chaps kept their headgear on, and if one looked closely, the end of a braided cue could be seen. The waiters were all young Chinamen, cueless, most of them, and immaculate in white jackets and aprons. Nearly all the older men still wore their long cues, wound above their heads, which were shaven in regular Chinese style; for the last sacrifice which a Chinaman makes is his cue.

After the entertainment, including music and an interesting description of the stereopticon views by Miss Clark, refreshments were served upon the teakwood tables, around which the guests were gathered in groups of four. Little cups, each holding about a-third of the ordinary teacup, were used. What these little cups lacked in size was made up in beauty of design and coloring. A pot of steaming tea was then placed upon the table, the guests being expected to help themselves. The tea was delicious. The sweets were first served, consisting of ginger, oranges and citron, all preserved in different rich syrups; then a hot cake, cut in small cubes, was brought in upon a queer China dish, also hot. The cake tasted something like a cross between a waffle and sponge cake, being very delicate and white. This feast of Chinese delicacies ended with a dish the ingredients of which no one but the Chinese cook knew, and he did not divulge. It seemed to be a concoction of fruit, meat, vegetables, with spices and condiments, the whole cooked until tender and served with a bowl of rice, cooked as only Chinamen can cook it, with every kernel separate and white as snow.

TEA ON DAINTY CARVED TEAKWOOD TABLES

The Foreigners' Mission is doing good work in this strange part of New York, which looks at night, with its light and color, like a bit of the "Flowery Kingdom" transplanted. A number of the merchants who do business here are converts to Christianity, and are a great help to the mission workers. The mission is much in need at the present time of resident workers, and Miss Clark is anxious to secure the services of one or two consecrated workers. Much of the work is done in the open air, upon the streets. It is proposed, during the coming summer, to carry out a long-cherished plan of having stereopticon views in one of the parks in the locality. These pictures will tell the story of the Saviour's life and death. They have already been used, in a limited way, during the summer of 1903, and proved very effective in making the Gospel story clear to Chinese audiences.

The Nobility of Service

AS a man grows older, his outlook becomes broader, if he has lived a life of normal development. The glitter fades, and he can see beneath the outward show the real heart of his fellow-men. It is the result of a long course in the school of experience, a school whose teacher knows no favorites. He begins to weigh things. He measures at their true value high descent, wealth and character. He finds that the last is the one thing that is worth seeking, and that his highest ideal is Christian character, devoted to a life of service.

Andrew Carnegie, in his recent speech in Northampton, said that the alliance of birth and wealth was being displaced in our day by what a man knows. But that was not the final step; in the future, the question would be how a man serves his fellow-men.

Mr. Carnegie is himself an illustration of this final step. He has given his wealth right and left for the benefit of others, and by so doing has narrowed the chasm that yawns between the rich and the poor.

The best men in all ages have fouud their greatest pleasure in the life of service, who died, if need be, for a principle, that those who came after might benefit thereby. Nor have their efforts been fruitless, for it is to such men that the world's real honor is given. As the years go on, men are seeing more clearly that true happiness does not lie in the possession of great riches, but in the unspeakable joy that comes to one who puts his shoulder to the wheel of progress, who works among the suffering and the oppressed. The slums of our cities contain many of these knights of Christian service, and from those whom they have set upon their feet, they have received the accolade.

This country probably offers greater opportunities than any other for such service. We have fewer barriers to be broken down, but the need, nevertheless, is as great as anywhere else. Opportunity begets obligation. No man here can step aside, and let the rush of American life go by, and say that he is not of it. He must progress with it. Not to do so is to suffer effacement, so far as this world is concerned. It would be well if we all took up Mr. Carnegie's idea, which he adopted from Franklin: "that the highest form of worship of God is service of man." "Here," he declares, "is the true, the final aristocracy which never can be displaced." This is a benevolent age; colleges, hospitals, and libraries are being built, not for the benefit of the few, but for the uplift and happiness of the many. In our American democracy, high position and wealth are not holding back those who aspire to better things, but are reaching out the strong right hand of brotherhood.

It is the vindication of American institutions that the roadway to these better things is being cleared by those who have already passed over it, and those who come after build up, and do not tear down.

Confessing Christ

AMONG the Presbyterians of Springfield, O., there has lately arisen a very free discussion concerning the necessity of believers confessing Christ before the world. Some of the ministers invited the members of their congregations to state their opinions as to the causes which ordinarily prevent people from making public avowal of their belief in, and acceptance of Jesus as a Saviour. As a result, some highly interesting letters have been received. In one of these, which seems to have specially stirred up the ministers, the writer strikes the right key, when he says that the principal cause which keeps back men from making public confession is that they have not yet repented of their sins.

"No repentance, no pardon." If you do not feel your need of a Saviour, in all probability you will never know salvation. If you have no genuine sorrow over sin; no regrets for wasted years and neglected opportunities; no remorse over acts that honor, conscience and all Christian doctrine unite in condemning, then the likelihood is that you will continue in sin. Outward appearances and even actions count for little where the heart is not right with God.

There are two ways of confessing Jesus as Saviour: One is the avowal that is from the lips outward; the other is from the repentant and contrite heart. Christ himself declared repentance to be essential to salvation. It must precede confession, and without it there can be no true confession. Repentance is the fruit of conviction of sin, and confession is born of repentance. When a man has been convicted of sin, the "godly sorrow that worketh repentance" follows, as the light follows the darkness, and the next step is acceptance. When that is reached, and the "great decision" has been made once for all—it may be the work of an instant, or it may take the wavering soul an indefinite time—then the open avowal is no longer a dreaded ordeal. It becomes rather a delightful duty, which strengthens and refreshes the soul, and imparts a new sweetness to life. Indeed, the full meaning and happiness of conversion cannot be realized until we declare our allegiance before men. If we shrink from acknowledging Christ here on earth, we have no right to expect that he should acknowledge us hereafter.

Sticking to the Essentials

ONE of the most hopeful auguries of a time of blessing for the churches, is to be found in the disposition among the clergy to heartily unite in Christian aggressive work. During the recent meetings in Boston, Unitarians and Salvationists, hitherto regarded as at the opposite poles of religious organization, cordially co-operated with one another and with other churches in the efforts to win souls to Christ, and redeem the lost from wickedness and degradation. One hundred and sixty churches were represented in the movement, and apart from the success that attended it, the value of such union cannot be over-estimated. The ministers and the churches seem at last to have realized that the main business of their lives is not to emphasize and to contend over doctrinal differences, but to bring men to Christ. If that disposition extends and persists, we may hope for such an ingathering of souls as this generation has not witnessed.

A further indication of this change of attitude is reported from the other side the Atlantic. In the Council of the free churches recently held at Manchester, the questions involved in the Higher Criticism—a fruitful source of dissension—came up for discussion. Ordinarily much time would have been consumed in the debate, and heated arguments on both sides would have been waged; but to the surprise of all, a common ground of agreement was reached. Dr. Campbell Morgan on the one side, declared his firm belief in the literal truth of the Old Testament miracles. He avowed his conviction that Balaam's ass actually spoke to the prophet in articulate words, and that Jonah was actually swallowed by a fish prepared of God for the purpose, and afterward lived to execute his mission to the people of Nineveh. But he went on to say that he had more important work to do than to fight over the body of a dead ass, and that he held it to be a more urgent duty to proclaim to the cities of the country the necessity of repentance and reformation of life, that Jonah preached in Nineveh, than to contend over the nature of the fish that figured in the narrative. On the other side, Prof. Peake, who was the recognized champion of the Higher Critics in the Council, declared that he could not accept Dr. Morgan's view. "Between him and me," he said, "there is a great gulf fixed, but there is solid ground beneath the gulf, and on the deepest things, I feel that we are united." What these things were he stated later, when he said: "Deeper than any criticism in me, is faith in the living God and in his Son." The whole Church of Christ will hail with joy such a recognition on both sides of the essentials of religion, and be glad that an era of brotherhood and toleration is dawning.

Still another evidence of consecration to the main purpose of Christianity was given by Dr. Hillis, the pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, in a speech at the Congregational Club in Boston. "It was," says one of his hearers, "a frank declaration that henceforth he gave his life to the one work of bringing men to Christ, and that his whole ministry would be devoted to evangelism." This is getting back to apostolic lines. The Apostle Paul said: "I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him cru fied." If our ministers are generally of that mind they cease trying to entertain their hearers with top of literary and social interest, and devote themselves the preaching of the plain Gospel, there is hope of new and genuine revival of religion. Never yet l the preaching of the Cross failed in its effect. Spurge and Moody and a host of preachers, on whose l thousands hung entranced, had no other message give, and desired no other, for they found that it w the power of God unto salvation. It will be a natu and a logical thing if the revival for which we have long been looking should begin in the pulpit.

Women and Capital Punishment

TWO or three hundred years ago, life was held cheaply that in England women were hanged f petty thefts, just as men were, and the belated travel on a lonely road might be startled by the grueson spectacle of a dead body chained to a gibbet, and swa ing back and forth at the sport of the wind.

As the world has grown better and kinder, and tl worth of life has been more highly regarded, capit punishment has been narrowed down to at most two three terrible offences against life and property. Mo and more the sentiment against legal killing deepens people increase in intelligence and make allowances f the feebleness of men under great temptation, and th influence of heredity and environment in the formatic of character. There is seldom a clamor for any one blood, except when murder has been committed unde aggravating circumstances, and if only the murdere can be imprisoned until his deed is forgotten, the publi is ready to condone his crime, so far as the extrem penalty is concerned.

Imprisonment for life, or for many years, might in volve more hardship and suffering of mind than death and, if it were substituted, would probably satisfy ever demand of justice.

Women, at the highest point of civilization, suffe more acutely than any but women dream. Thei lot, coming down from Mother Eve, has been a har one. Womanhood in itself inspires a degree of com passion when it has been trampled under foot, an turning, has rent its tyrant, or has made its place witl the vile. We dare to hope for a day when the shadov of the gallows will never fall, at least across any trem bling woman, however guilty she may have been. There are crimes against nature, and this is one.

Death as a punishment for crime is supposed to have a deterrent effect on other criminals. The terrible example, it is thought, will keep others from yielding to evil passions, to anger, malice, and rapacity. But one questions whether the red hand of the murderer is ever stayed by the thought of the sentence that will follow on his conviction. It is a sad and puzzling world in which we live, and sin has left its awful brand on much of its fair ground and in its goodly cities; yet the promise of a better and brighter day is given us, and we may confidently hope that ere long it will be here, when the reign of the Prince of Peace shall prevail, and the tumult and strife, and the warring elements of evil, sent from the adversary and the pit, will cease from their malignant work.

Among the Workers

—FAIRMONT, W. VA., has just witnessed one of the most thorough-going and far-reaching revivals it has ever known. Hundreds confessed Christ, including many church members. Evangelist Bromley was in charge of the meetings.

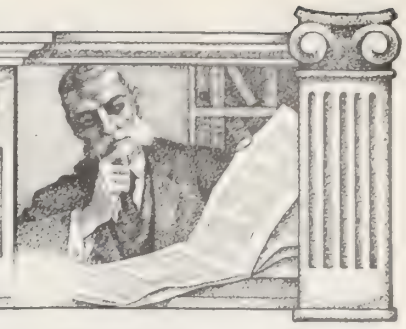
THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER



The Hostile Fleets

INTEREST in the struggle between Russia and Japan was transferred last week from the hostilities on land to the struggle impending on the seas. Suddenly Admiral Rojestvensky, whose movements have been a mystery since he quitted Madagascar, emerged from the straits of Malacca into the China Sea. His appearance there was unexpected. He had adopted a ruse to deceive the Japanese commander, Admiral Togo. He had sent instructions to his Government to have colliers sent to him in the straits of Sunda, doubtless believing that the Japanese intelligence department, always on the alert, would obtain the false information. He is said to have under his command seven battleships, two armored cruisers and thirty five smaller vessels. Against these Admiral Togo has five battleships, eight armored cruisers, sixteen torpedo boats, and other vessels. It is evident that the Russians have succeeded in getting in advance of their enemies, if they are bound, as is probable, for Vladivostok. It would take at least two days for intelligence to reach Admiral Togo, if he was watching the straits of Sunda, that the Russians had passed to the north of him. It will depend on the speed of the respective squadrons whether the Japanese can overtake the Russians. That Rojestvensky anticipates an early battle is inferred from the fact that he sent his hospital ship, with all his sick men on board, to Saigon, the French port in Cochin China, soon after his arrival in Chinese waters. There is a well-equipped hospital there, and the Admiral sent the patients to his ally to be attended to, in order that his surgeons might be free to look after the men who will be wounded in the naval battle that is impending. His bold course in steering into the open sea appears to indicate that he wishes to encounter the Japanese fleet in that locality, where the advantages would be on his side. That so able a tactician as Admiral Togo will oblige him by fighting there, is believed by naval experts to be improbable. It is thought that the Korean strait, which Rojestvensky must travel, will be a more advantageous battle scene for the Japanese, and that the conflict will take place there. That it will be a desperate struggle whenever and wherever it comes, is well understood. Rojestvensky may be the means of turning the fortunes of the war; but if he is defeated, and his fleet destroyed, the Russian case will indeed be desperate. No matter which fleet may be the victor, the slaughter on both sides is sure to be terrific. Like the conflict predicted by the prophet, this battle will be a spectacle of horror.

MAP SHOWING THE LOCALITY OF THE EXPECTED NAVAL BATTLE

Every battle of the warrior is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood; but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire (Isa. 9: 5).

Radium as a Remedy

A series of experiments, conducted by Prof. C. Phesllix of Paris, has demonstrated the value of radium as an antidote for poison. Believing that the properties of radium would disintegrate the poison of the most venomous creatures, he procured specimens of the virus of various reptiles to submit to it. The poison of the viper and of the cobra were secured, and a bottle containing them was exposed to the radium rays. After fifty hours, the character of the poison was completely changed. It was injected into a guinea-pig without producing any fatal effect. Further experiments showed that the same result could be obtained from radium emanations in even a shorter time. A tube filled to two-thirds of its capacity with the poison was filled up with air containing radium emanations. In six hours the same result was produced, and the poison became harmless. The value of this discovery to the people of India and other lands in which venomous snakes abound, cannot be estimated. If is an extraordinary thing that the poison can be driven out or neutralized by the light of the rays. So it is with the virus of sin since Christ came, who is the light of the world.

I am the light of the world, he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life (John 8: 12).

Long Lost Brother Found

A brother and sister long separated have been reunited through an accidental visit from a common friend. Thirty-two years ago, a man living in Brooklyn, N. Y., fell sick and died. His wife, after a year's struggle to support their two children, was prostrated and died also. A relative took charge of the eldest child, a girl six years old. The younger, a boy of two years, was placed in an orphanage. He was subsequently taken into the family of a farmer, but did not remain there long, owing to a change in the farmer's circumstances. He was then adopted by a neighbor, but again became homeless through the death of his foster father. His next home was with a farmer in a distant State, who heard of his destitute condition and took pity on him. He was educated and so won the affection of his patron, that he was brought up as his son and took his name. Finally he inherited his property and is now living on the farm that he owns. Meanwhile his sister, grown to womanhood, and married, was searching for him. He was the only relative she had in the world and she longed to see him. For more than ten years she has been trying to find him. Recently a friend whom she had consulted, during a business trip, made the acquaintance of the farmer. He was struck at once with his resemblance to his friend. "If I did not know your name," he said, "I should think you were the brother of a friend of mine." The other replied, "Perhaps I am, for the name I bear is not mine." He related his history and eagerly asked for details. The result was that brother and sister, so long separated, were reunited, to the intense joy of both. Though so long separated, they were drawn to one another by the tie of blood, which neither time nor distance can sever. So should it be with all who are children of God.

This commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God, love his brother also (I. John 4: 21).

Infected Cars

At the approaching meeting in Washington, D. C., of the National Association for the study and prevention of tuberculosis, a danger which the doctors say is a fruitful source of infection, is to be considered. It is that of the infection of railroad cars by consumptive patients. One of the most earnest advocates of some preventive measure to ward off this danger is Dr. S. J. Crombine, Secretary of the Kansas State Board of Health. He says that there is scarcely a transcontinental train going West the year round that does not carry its one or more passengers afflicted with tuberculosis, seeking the life-giving and healthful resorts of Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona. It must be self-evident that these cars are in a chronic state of infection. "Time and again," he says, "I have personally observed a consumptive in a day coach. These people being of low vitality and afraid of draughts and cool air while traveling, require the coaches to be closed, which adds to the danger of infection to their fellow passengers." He urges that some means be adopted for changing every few minutes the air in every car by a current of pure air. Every measure that the doctors can devise to prevent the spread of the dire scourge, ought to be employed, and so simple a plan as flooding the cars with pure air is so easy to carry out, that it will probably be adopted. It is greatly to be wished that the contagion of sin, as deadly to the soul as consumption is to the body, could be as easily dispersed; but men love sin too well to provide against it.

One sinner destroyeth much good (Eccles. 9: 18).

Under a Snow-Slide

A Colorado miner had a narrow escape from death a few days ago. He set out to visit his claims on Lost Canyon, and was climbing a very steep hill, when, to his horror, he saw that a mass of snow several acres in extent on the side of the hill, was beginning to move. It was traveling slowly, but measuring the distance by the eye he saw that it was impossible to get out of its way. To run before it was futile, for he knew that its speed would increase every minute with its momentum. Realizing that if it forced him down to the bottom of the gulch he would be killed, he struggled to get hold of a tree that was in the path of the glacier. The first limb that he caught, broke off, but he grasped the trunk and clung for his life. The strain on his arms was terrific, but he knew that his life depended on the strength of his grip, and he held on firmly. How long he remained there he does not know, but it seemed to him like years. Gradually the strain relaxed, and at last the end of the slide passed. He was too weak for some time to move, but after a rest of half an hour he was able to return to his home. The convulsive energy with which the imperilled man clung to the tree, is an example for the Christian who is threatened with temptation and trial. So long as he clings to Christ he is safe.

When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him (Isa. [illegible]).

The Open Secret of a Fruitful Life

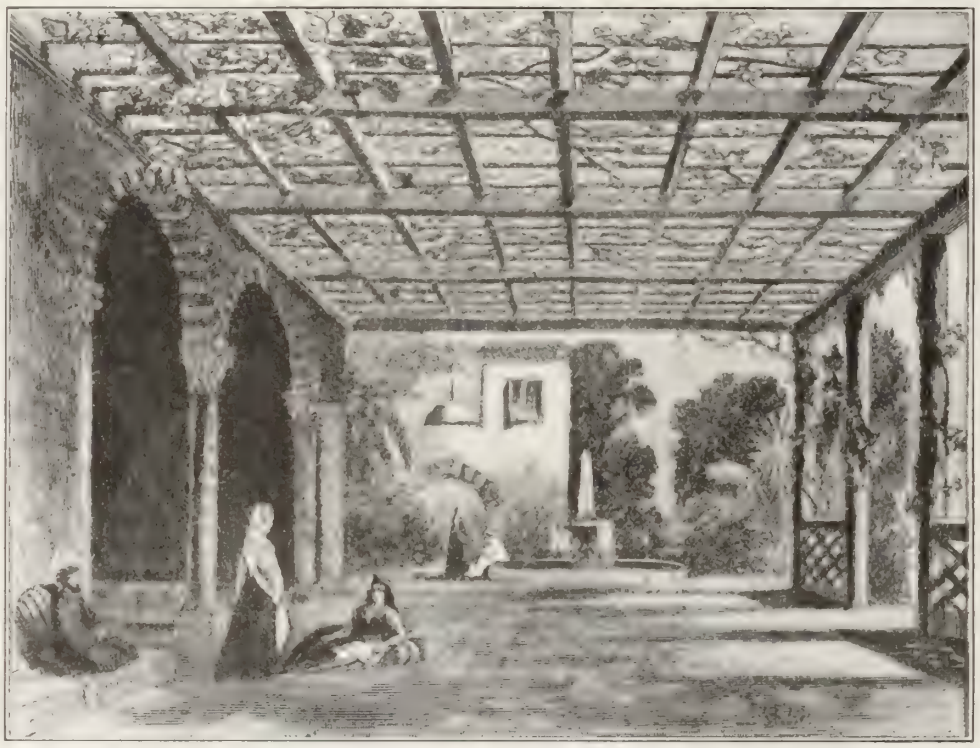
Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts*

CHRIST and his apostles, save Judas, are still in the upper room where they have eaten the Passover supper, and partaken of the bread and wine of the New Testament. They have risen from their places at the table, and gathered about Christ, who has some last words to speak to them before he passes out into the darkness of the night and of sorrow. Jesus would say something to emphasize their close relation to him. He had just been saying: "Ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you." They were accustomed to the sight of vines laden with clusters of grapes, and also branches of the vine cut off and gathered for the burning, and Christ was ever fond of nature teaching. The world was to him God's oldest testament. It should speak to us, especially in the full bloom of spring. And so he takes the vine, with its branches, to illustrate the unity of his apostles, and all believers with himself: "I am the Vine, ye are the branches. My Father is the husbandman."

He would impress upon them the duty of good works, and then he compares with the clusters of grapes, "Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit." He would have them know that of themselves they could not do their good works. So he recalls the branches that have been severed from the vine, which they have seen lying about, and says, "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me." And not only does he teach them that without him they can do nothing, but in saying that branches detached from the vine wither, and are gathered together to be burned, he impresses them with the thought that there is a retribution for those who will separate themselves from him.

In contrast he brings before them the blessedness of unity with him, when he says, "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." He is the sap flowing through every part of the vine, carrying life and fruitfulness. A fruitful vine and all cedars praise the name of the Lord. The vine can have no conscious joy, but Jesus says to his apostles, "These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full."

And are they to have no sorrow, no pain? Jesus reminds them of the pruning the branches must have in order to bear fruit more abundantly. And then he says to them, "Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." They have seen many branches growing on one vine, companions for life. And Jesus says to them, "Love one another, even as I have loved you."



THE VINE-CLAD VESTIBULE OF AN ORIENTAL HOME

Illustration and Application

I am the True Vine. One of the most familiar symbols of the Jewish Church is the vine (Psa. 80:8; Isaiah 5; Jer. 2:21; Hos. 10:1). By the use of this symbol, the New Testament Church is recognized as the true Israel, the living branches of the true Messiah, whose life, like sap, is imparted to them for fruitfulness—all not grafted in him, such as the proud Pharisees, being pictured as separated, dying branches, fit only for burying. The "Vine of David" was used as a metaphor for Christ, the son of David, and was probably often on the lips of Jews in the years preceding the coming of Christ. Some commentators have thought that the immediate suggestion of the figure of the vine, was a great golden vine on the eastern gate of Jerusalem, of a size so great that it had "clusters as long as a man." From Jewish authorities, we learn that this vine kept growing greater and greater, for many made offerings of a gold leaf, others of a cluster, or even a branch, which were hung up as additions to the vine. This vine was over the golden portal, which latter, as Josephus says, had no doors that could be closed, but through it "the clear and unexcluded heaven shed its light within, and from without appeared the whole gilded entrance of the first house of the temple all whose interior shone with gold."

As the vine was in Palestine the king of fruits, it was the fitting symbol of him who was and is the king of men. He was indeed "a cluster as long as a man," an embodiment of all the varied "fruit of the spirit" in Paul's wonderful group of spiritual graces (Gal. 5:22). And he, too, has grown greater with the years. As men more fully appreciate his matchless life, his matchless words, his matchless influence; earth's greatest men continually add their golden tribute to his greatness and goodness. He indeed overhangs the entrance to the church, and the entrance to heaven, picturing the only Way and the joy of such entrance through the ever open door. Not alone at the grave but at the door of the church, the "clear and unexcluded light of heaven" shines upon all who love the Christ. Let all who have not entered this gate to a life of joy and fruitfulness, enter now, when the full bloom of spring proclaims the nearness and providing love of God. He would so dwell within us in his spirit as to fill our lives with flowers of joy and fruits of usefulness.

Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away. (See also verse 6). What if the churches suddenly purged their rolls of all unfruitful members—those who never bring other souls to Christ; who do not ever even strive to be useful; whose names on the church book stand for nothing done, nothing even attempted—what a shrinking of church statistics there would be! This lesson tells us God's church-roll in heaven is so purged. No unfruitful branches are kept. It is often said: "It matters not what a man believes if he only acts right." Somebody has improved it as follows: "It matters not what he believes if he does not act right." Everything in nature fulfils its purpose, except man. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis writes: "All the stars and planets have been obedient. Like well-trained steeds, they have pulled evenly in their traces. The sun has not been miserly. No star has rebelled against its pathway. No river has struck against the mill wheel. No wind has refused to help the sails. The hills have not hoarded their treasure, nor have the vineyards put up bars against the sunshine. Men have tormented men, men have been brutal to men, men have destroyed men; but no orchard has set itself in battle array against the husbandman, and no vineyard has lifted its boughs as clubs for striking." A plant or tree goes right on bearing its own fruit, even when grafted into some other plant or tree. See that mountain ash in full bloom, and in its topmost branches a cluster of pear blossoms! Some years since a noted horiculturist took a friend to see his orchard of young peach trees. It was a splendid sight. Thousands of trees standing in long rows, and comprising all the richest varieties of that delicious fruit. The friend said: "I presume you are very careful in the selection of yc peach-kernels, in order to get the rarest quality of frui "No," replied he; "we plant whatever comes to han and then we bud them. Every one of those trees w budded." This brought to light a curious fact. Does gardener wish to raise a rare and splendid fruit, he tak a bud or sprout from a bearing tree, and grafts it. N matter how poor a variety the stock may be upon whi he grafts it, the bud will preserve its own identity; it w grow up, and bear its own fruit. Shall not this teach to be true to God's purpose in us, though we are throw into strange and unfriendly relations. A Christian ca and should be fruitful anywhere. The burning in th sixth verse, calls up the fact that the future punishme described in the New Testament, is mostly for not doir right rather than for doing wrong (Matt. 25; Luke 16)

Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, tha it may bear more fruit. If the branch could speak, might murmur at the pruner's knife that seems bent o its destruction, but it cuts away only what would wast the sap in useless stock and leaves, that what re mains may be more fruitful. So it is the uptorn groun that yields the rich harvest. Rain, no less than sunligh develops the buried seed. "All sunshine makes th desert." Soul and soil alike need all kinds of weather and night as well as day, winter as well as summer. Th forest tree that is surrounded by other trees, so that th wind can stir only its tops, whe other trees are cut away, goe down before the first storm, whil the tree that has wrestled alon with the winds from the begin ning, withstands the fiercest gale It is only by bruising that mos seeds give up their fragrance an nutrition.

* * *

Now ye are clean through the Word. Before Christ's life flow in, you say sin must be put out Nay, let nature teach the "ex pulsive power of a new affec tion." See the old leaves or the trees in winter. It would be a long, vain task to try to knock them off with clubs or to pick them off one by one. But see how the new buds of spring push them off, as the sun pushes off a boy's winter mittens. So sinful habits of deed and word, and sinful thoughts and desires are driven out of our lives by the new desires that pulse through us when we are grafted into the true Vine.

* * *

As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself . . . no more can ye except ye abide in me. As a piece of iron in the blacksmith shop is cold and black and hard until it is put in the fire, and then glows and is shaped by the master to his uses, so the Christian can glory only when in Christ, and only then can be moulded to divine purposes.

Results of Abiding in Christ. He that abideth in me and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit. The church should not be judged by its unfruitful branches lying about waiting to be burned, but by its fruitful branches that are really a part of the vine. There is a suggestion of the cheery helpfulness that the true Christian carries everywhere in the story of the woman who plucked a handful of sweetbrier in the morning, and put it on her hat and forgot she had done so; but all day long as she strolled about with friends she enjoyed the fragrance and again and again said to herself, "Some one must have a bouquet of sweetbrier." Such a fragrant life in a wife was the means of an infidel's conversion. One day the news was telegraphed abroad that Reuben Dailey, editor of the Jeffersonville News, had joined the Presbyterian Church. He had been an out-and-out infidel of the most aggressive type, bringing infidel lecturers to that place. So bitter was he, that when he started his paper he gave but one special order, and that was that "God" should be spelled with a little "g." The dispatch to the New York Times stated that "his wife has been for all these years a consistent member of the church with which he had at last connected himself."

It is said that when Thorwaldsen, the Danish sculptor, returned to his native land with those works of art which have made his name immortal, chiseled in Italy, the servants who unpacked the marbles scattered upon the ground the straw which was wrapped around them; and the next summer flowers from the gardens of Rome were blooming in the streets of Copenhagen from the seeds thus borne and planted by accident. So a Christian scatters seeds of noble living wherever he goes.

Every altar typifies the Cross, and every slain offering the Crucified. The Tabernacle, with rough exterior among other tents, pictured Christ living among men, John 1:14; while the golden interior represents his divine nature. Its altar of sacrifice, at the entrance, represents Calvary; its laver, Christ's purity; its bread, his imparted life in us; its candlestick, his enlightening influence in the world; its incense, his prayers and praises; its holy of holies, the heaven to which his rent flesh opens our way. The leper again shows how the sinner is saved by sacrifice; the uplifted serpent, John 3:14, proclaims how he has "become sin for us," and the Star pictures him as the light of the world).

THE RESURRECTION OF MISS CYNTHIA

By FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Miss Cynthia Day had been for years under the ontrol of rigid and harsh grandparents, as well a severe mother. All the natural inclinations girlhood had been suppressed. After the death her relatives, she continues the same narrow istence, economizing from habit, and ably as- ted in this by the old servant, Abby Whiton. roubled by a pain in her chest she visits a doc- r, who shocks her with the announcement at she has only a year to live. Her whole soul bels against the thought of death. She meets e Puffer twins, and she joins them in her first n down hill, and also accepts an invitation to eir picnic, much to Abby Whiton's annoyance. ie twins stray off, and Cynthia, searching for em, loses her way and is found by George ossom, a young house-painter, with decorative nbitions. On the way home she engages him paint and paper the Breyfogle house.

CHAPTER V.—Continued

"WE didn't see you anywhere," Edwina said, addressing Miss Cynthia, while Harriet explored the wagon ke a particularly active squirrel. "But ound your basket and brought it ome. We saved two slices of bread nd jam for you and one apple, and 'e put a big bunch of wintergreen erries in besides."

"Thank you," said Miss Cynthia gra- ously. "I found this arbutus and rought it to you. Here is a big bunch or each of you."

"Where's yours?" demanded Harriet. Didn't you keep any for yourself? 'e ate lots an' lots of wintergreen erries as we went along, an' we rought some home. We like to be quare."

Miss Cynthia had opened her mouth reply, when she was transfixed by ie sight of a stout, imposing woman, earing a fortress-like bonnet, which ommanded a very high and promi- ent forehead. This person was ad- ancing majestically along the side- alk in company with a much smaller dy, who was compelled to tilt her ead sideways to address her lofty ompanion. They had been talking arnestly together, but the conversa- on suddenly ceased when they sim- ltaneously recognized Miss Cynthia her unlooked-for position on the igh seat of George Blossom's wagon. hat young person blushed as he lifted is cap to the ladies. He was a very odest young man, was George Blos- om, and he realized in his imperfect asculine way that his companion had one a very singular thing in losing erself upon a muddy road three miles eyond Innisfield.

Miss Cynthia spoke first, she had im- ediately recognized the tall lady as Irs. Buckthorn, the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Ladies' id Society, which was to have met t her house that afternoon. The small dy was the wife of the minister. Good afternoon, Mrs. Buckthorn," be- an Miss Cynthia, with an anxious, ropitiatory smile. "I am sorry I was ot at home this afternoon when the ommittee called. I—I was away on a icnic, and I lost my way in the woods. Besides," she added, with undeniable ardihood, "I forgot all about the eeting."

Mrs. Buckthorn drew in her breath a peculiar, sibilant fashion she was ccustomed to make use of when sur- rised or displeased. "So—I have earned," she said deliberately. "Abby Vhiton told us of the picnic. She did ot know that you had—forgotten the ppointment. I dare say you had a very excellent reason for what you did. The—Lord's—business does not admit of—delay or—negligence on the part of his servants."

Miss Cynthia shook her head. "I wanted to go," she said simply, "and so—I just forgot all about the meeting. I hope it didn't put you out very much."

"No, it didn't at all," the small lady spoke up quickly. "I asked the committee to come to the parsonage, and we've had the meeting. I hope you had a pleasant time," she went on, her smile touched with a faint wistfulness. "I'd like to go arbutus hunting myself

"THIS SUGGESTION MISS CYNTHIA WEAKLY FOLLOWED TO THE LETTER"

—I see you have some. But there seems to be so much to do in the parish just now."

"And—house-cleaning, Philura," put in Mrs. Buckthorn in her majestic bass. "Every one of us ladies left some—important household task—unfinished in order to attend—this meeting. I trust that we shall not be found—unfaithful stewards of the mammon of—unrighteousness when the last day comes!"

"I'm not going to clean house," said Miss Cynthia defiantly. "I'm going to have a picnic almost every day."

"Goody! goody!" cried the Puffer twins in subdued chorus. "Will you bring jam on bread and red apples every time?"

"As long as they last," Miss Cynthia told them cheerfully.

Then followed a prolonged silence, in the course of which George Blossom stared hard at the back of his brown horse, and the two women on the sidewalk stared at Miss Cynthia. Mrs. Buckthorn's gaze, delivered over the rim of her spectacles, conveyed shocked incredulity, majestic displeasure, pained astonishment and determined curiosity. The light blue eyes of the minister's wife were opened wide in a puzzled and surprised look, which Miss Cynthia met with a deprecatory smile.

"I guess we'd better be moving along, Mis' Pettibone," observed Mrs. Buckthorn, in the tone of a magistrate who suspends sentence. "Good bye, Cynthia. I trust—the Lord will give you a better mind before you sleep."

"Fussy old hypocrite!" muttered George Blossom, with cheerful acrimony. "Do you want to get out here, Miss Day, or shall I drive you on to your house? I'd like to look the place over as soon as I can."

"Thank you," said Miss Cynthia, with an absent-minded smile. Then she became conscious that the young man's honest gray eyes were fixed inquiringly upon her. "I don't know what people will say when I begin to do the things—that—that I—want to do. I've always done just what somebody else told me to do; it—it's easier, I guess."

"I s'pose all the old tabbies in town 'll talk to beat the cars if you let me have that job of painting and papering," said George Blossom gloomily, "But I'd let 'em talk. I would, by gracious! 'Tain't any of their funeral, I guess. Now, is it?"

"No," said Miss Cynthia, with a curious little catch in her breath. "It certainly isn't. I think—I shall let them talk," she went on after a little pause. "That is, I can't help it if they do talk; but I shall do as I like."

Her blue eyes were so puzzled and wistful a look that George Blossom was moved to squeeze the little hand she offered him while he shook it warmly.

"Thank you very much for bringing me home," said Miss Cynthia. "I don't know what I should have done, if you hadn't come along just when you did."

"Don't you mention it, ma'am," cried George Blossom, giving the chilly little fingers another warm squeeze. "I can tell you it was a piece of rare good fortune for me. I should have never thought of such a thing as asking you for a job. I'll be around to-morrow morning with my color-cards and sample-books. I'll guarantee to do a job that 'll please you, Miss Day, and make the old place look simply great. You 'll see!"

Miss Cynthia smiled in pleased anticipation; she was, nevertheless, depressed to the point of feeling utterly meek and despondent when she had entered her own door and closed it behind her. Abby Whiton hastened to describe the visit of the committee with an amplitude of graphic detail which left room for neither question nor comment.

"I cert'ly thought I should die when I seen 'em all a-standin' there," she asseverated: "Mis' Buckthorn an' the minister's wife—though she ain't much, as all of us knows, an Electa Pratt, with the feathers stickin' up straight in her bunnit—she's always wore 'em sence Philura Rice caught the parson with hern. 'No;' I says, 'She ain't in; she's gone on a picnic.' My land! I could a-knocked 'em down with a feather they looked s' thunder-struck. 'To a picnic?' says Mis' Buckthorn. 'Yes,' I says, 'with the Puffer twins!' I thought I should die!"

"Suppose you should?"

"Should what?"

"Should die. Suppose you knew you were going to die—you're always talking about it. What would you do?"

"Fer goodness sake, what an idea! I cert'nly ain't a-goin' t' die till my time comes. Well, I guess I'd get my kitchen cleaned up good fer one thing. Then I'd plan out my fun'ral, an' order my tombstone. Ma, she picked out all her fun'ral hymns, I remember; an' pa, he s'lected a tex' fer his fun'ral sermon. He tol' us everythin' we was to put on him down to his socks. He wanted all his best things. Like es not he was 'fraid we'd save 'em up fer Dave an' Will; an' mebbe we would 'uv, too, if pa hadn't been cute enough to think it all out beforehand. Sickness is sent, I s'pose, so 'at we c'n prepare fer what's before us. I hope to the land I ain't called sudden!"

"You may broil a chop for my tea," said Miss Cynthia unexpectedly, "I want it brown and hot. I didn't have any dinner, you know. I want some toast, too."

"Yer supper's been ready an' waitin'

Bethlehem's Springtide Festival

LONG before iron and steel works, and silk and knitting mills had made Bethlehem, Pa., favorably known in the commercial world, Moravian music and religious festivals had won favor for the Mission Station on the Lehigh River, and given this region a religious interest to the Christian, akin to Bethlehem in Palestine. The name, "House of Bread," is significant of the wisdom of the Moravians that located here in 1742, for the fertility of these Pennsylvania farms is proverbial. Here was established in 1777 the general hospital of the Continental Army; and they still point out the building which sheltered Lafayette. Near by about five hundred Continental soldiers were buried.

Besides using the trombones at Easter, they are employed instead of a bell, to announce a death in the community. A trombonist ascends the stairs and plays a "dead march" for the departed, and the music floats off over the valley of South Bethlehem, telling that another soul has gone over Jordan.

MR. J. F. WOLLE

There is a legend, that when the settlement was young, the Indians had plotted its destruction, but when creeping along the river bank they heard the sweet music of the trombones on the night air, and were diverted from their murderous purpose, and so the death of one of the community announced from the chapel had saved the entire village. This fine old custom survives, and is a proof of a faith that does not falter at the portals of the grave.

Here the Moravian Church has its strong centre as a religious sect, with its college, theological seminary and a seminary for women. They do not care to be called a sect or a denomination, but theirs has been a movement to increase the ideas of the "Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man," and the spiritual life of all.

The Moravian religious and music-loving life is well shown in its Bach Cycle of Christmas, Lenten, Easter and Ascension music. The entire cycle was planned and arranged by Mr. J. Fred Wolle, who for nearly a score of years has been making known to the people of this quaint Pennsylvania town the possibilities of Bach music. Mr. Wolle studied in Germany, and, fresh from the influence of the Fatherland, he took charge of the Bethlehem choir, that produced St. John's Passion Music in 1888. It was the first time it had been performed with success in America. In 1892, the Passion Music, according to St. Matthew, was rendered, and in 1894 the Christmas Oratorio. By 1900, the Moravian singers had acquired such mastery of the technique and spirit of Bach that they gave the famous mass in B. Minor. In 1901, a three days' festival was given, and in 1903, one of six days was held. In the latter festival, two days of Advent, Passion and Easter music were given. Mr. Wolle arranged the Lenten Festival that was held this month.

Lent, with its thoughts of penitence, confession, forgiveness, peace, and self-sacrifice, has gained in favor among many religious bodies. One of its direct benefits is the gain to health as a result of abstinence from luxuries. The Moravian view of Lent is most reverential and spiritual.

During the three days of the Lenten Festival there were rendered, "Jesus sleeps, what hope remaineth?" "The solemn moment is impending," "I with my Cross-staff gladly wander," "Strike, O strike, long-looked-for hour," "He who relies on God's compassion," and the Passion music according to St. John, and other compositions. The present cycle of Bach music will conclude with an Easter and Ascension Festival, beginning June 1.

Not even in Jerusalem is Easter so joyously celebrated as it is in this Bethlehem of the New World, and long before daylight people begin to drive in from South Bethlehem, Nazareth and Litz; people in smart traps and farmers with their families in roomy, old-fashioned carriages. While it is still dark they gather under the trees in the old cemetery, and await the Easter morn. The trombone players remain patiently in the belfry until in the East the watcher catches a glimpse of the breaking day. Then the trombones are raised, and there floats far and wide over the hills and vales of America's Bethlehem, the notes that announce that the Christian's day of days has come. The people gather for the service in the historic church, and the entire congregation is pervaded with a feeling of joy which rises with the major-keyed music, almost to exultation. The Easter thought of this missionary and devout people is well expressed in the chorus:

TROMBONISTS IN THE BELFRY

The heavens laugh, the earth rejoices,
And budding nature bursts in song:
Our Maker lives, the Highest is triumphant,
All now from death and bondage free.
He who within the grave has slumbered,
No more among the dead is numbered.

* * *

The Bach choir consists of 124 members, many of whom come long distances for rehearsals, while the orchestra consists of sixty instruments.

A Song of Worry

WHAT'S the use to sit an' worry if you lose, who thought to win?
Kick the worry out the winder—let the livin' sunshine in!
Time ain't sighin'—
He's a-flyin';
Worryin' is half a sin!

What's the use to work for worry? Ain't there any hope in sight?
Kick the worry out the winder, in the blizzard an' the night!
Time don't worry—
Too much hurry!
Swifter than an eagle's flight!

What's the use? There ain't a reason, nor the shadder of a rhyme,
When the worl' rolls on in music, an' the stars are keepin' time!
Time ain't cryin'—
He's a-flyin',
An' you're on the wings of Time.

A simple and proper method of cleaning costly and easily-injured articles is to make a suds of hot water and Ivory Soap, and allow it to cool until lukewarm. This solution, while very effective, is perfectly harmless.

Ivory Soap contains no alkali. It will not destroy the surface or texture of any material, however delicate.

Ivory Soap differs from other soaps. It is more carefully made, and the materials used in its manufacture are the purest and best.

IT FLOATS.

'er half an hour," Abby Whiton replied, moving her angular elbows in a way which signified a determined difference of opinion. "There's dried beef an' pickles, an' cake an' tea. I'm sure that's enough fer——"

Miss Cynthia walked into the kitchen. "Give me the toasting-fork," she said tranquilly. "I think I should like to get my own supper."

Abby Whiton planted her hands on her hips, her elbows vibrating rapidly. "Git yer own supper!" she exclaimed. "Well, I want-to-know!"

"Bring me the chop, Abby, and some bread," ordered Miss Cynthia, opening the drafts of the stove. "I shall get thoroughly warm while I am doing it!"

"Now, look-a-here, Miss Cynthy, I've lived in this 'ere house goin' on thirty years, an' I ain't in the habit of havin' nobody come in my kitchen an' talk up to me! Even yer ma never done it towards the last, an' you know very well that I ain't a-goin to stan' it. You an' me ain't never had no words before, an' I don't see why we should begin now. Seems to me you've been actin' mighty notional an' uppity since yiste'd'y. I've been thinkin' 'bout it all day b'spells. I remember when you was little, you us't to git fractious once in a while; but your ma or yer Gran'ma Breyfogle always took it out of ye mighty quick. As yer ma us't to say: 'dis'pline mus' be maintained,' she sez. I never looked fer any trouble in this 'ere kitchen; an' I ain't goin' to have none, neither."

Miss Cynthia listened attentively to this manifesto, a worried but entirely stubborn expression gathering about her small mouth. Abby Whiton was irresistibly reminded of the long-defunct Grandfather Breyfogle, whose imperial dictum nobody had ever been able to successfully contravene. "Fer the lan's sake;" she muttered to herself, "suppose she sh'd take a turn after all these years!"

When Miss Cynthia spoke it was in the Breyfogle voice, and the Breyfogle revolutionary spirit looked out of her blue eyes. "You will have to remember in future, Abby, that this is my kitchen," she said distinctly, "and that it is in my house. I want you to bring my chop and two slices of my bread. I shall get my supper on my stove. Do you understand me?"

Abby Whiton stared. "Fer the lan's sake!" she repeated in a sibilant whisper. Then she whirled about with loud trampling steps, more expressive of her dazed and outraged feelings than mere profanity, however lurid, cut the bread, brought the chop from the closet, and finished by slamming down the toasting-fork with an accentuated clatter which scared the dozing cat into wild-eyed consternation.

"I c'n see what's a-comin'!" she exclaimed bitterly. "After all these years, an' me a-slavin' my fingers to the bone sense you was knee high to a grasshopper an' never allowed no imperdunce in this kitchen. If I live, I leave to-morrow mornin', bag an' baggage!" She might have added with entire suitability "and may the Lord have mercy on your soul."

Miss Cynthia proceeded to toast her chop with outward calm, her mouth still wearing the Breyfogle expression. Inwardly, she was quaking with long-accustomed dread. Never before in the course of her whole life had she ventured to differ in the slightest degree with the definite opinions of Abby Whiton. She had, of course, made a dignified but entirely superficial show of consulting her about the various household activities and economies; but in the end she had invariably yielded to Abby Whiton's loudly-expressed decisions. Miss Cynthia's intellect refused to contemplate the consequences of her present rash behavior.

"To-morrow mornin'," repeated Abby Whiton triumphantly; she appeared to divine the real state of her mistress's mind, and proceeded to pile Pelion upon Ossa with mistaken energy. "I guess yer poor, dear ma 'ud turn over in her grave if she could know that I'd been fairly driv' to leave her kitchen after all these years. W'y, I've always intended to lay you out, Miss Cynthy, same as I done fer her."

Miss Cynthia turned suddenly; her eyes blazed. "I don't want you to stay here," she said breathlessly. "You—you shall not lay me out. Do you hear? You shall not. I am going to—let you live—anywhere you want to except in this kitchen; but I'm going to do as I please in my own house as long as I live. Do you hear me?"

"I ain't deef," snorted Abby Whiton. Then she sprang forward just in time to catch Miss Cynthia's slight figure as she swayed weakly toward the hot stove. "Did you ever!" she muttered to herself as she skilfully plied the camphor and smelling-salts. "She's jest plain beat out with that ridic'lous picnic—trampin' with a lot of young-ones, an' joltin' in a lumber-wagon from goodness knows where. I hope I c'n see my duty; an' I shall do it!"

She helped her mistress to bed with a firmness not untouched with real tenderness, which melted Miss Cynthia's soul within her. As she sat propped among her white pillows eating the chop and toast, which Abby Whiton presently set before her with a curiously indulgent air, she reviewed the circumstances of her revolt with mild regret. "I'm sorry I spoke to you just as I did, Abby," she said meekly. "I—was pretty tired, I guess, and——"

"Don't you say 'nuther word, Miss Cynthy; it's all right. I'll see 'at you don't git so tuckered out agin, that's all," Abby Whiton told her, with the strong kindness of tone and manner one would use toward a particularly exasperating child, made ill by her own naughtiness.

Miss Cynthia weakly permitted the inference to pass. But the tranquil stubbornness of the Breyfogles rested upon her sleeping features in so marked a degree, that Abby Whiton observed it with fresh astonishment when she came to remove the tray and the candle. "My goodness! ef she ain't a-gittin' to be the livin' image of her gran'pa!" she murmured, "an' the land knows he was his own boss, 's well 's everybody else's, to his dyin' day!"

CHAPTER VI.

THE fact that the rain was pouring out of a dun-colored sky in torrents did not damp the business ardor of young Mr. Blossom. He appeared at Miss Cynthia's door, clad in a streaming mackintosh, bearing a streaming umbrella and a huge package of samples done up in waterproof cloth, under his arm.

"No, you can't see Miss Cynthy; she's flat on her back this mornin'," Abby Whiton informed him. "I've jes' took her breakfas' up-stairs, an' she ain't goin' to git out o' bed to-day. I do' know but what I shell sen' fer the doctor. 'Twouldn't su'prise me a mite ef she sh'd hev a long spell of sickness after what she done yiste'd'y. Where in under the sun did you come accrost her, George?"

"Over on Scott's cross-road, not far from the old red bridge," said Mr. Blossom. He looked exceedingly disappointed. "Do you suppose she'd be able to look over these samples?" he asked. "She told me to bring 'em this morning, sure. And, of course, the quicker I get to work on the job the quicker I can get it done."

"What job?" demanded Abby Whiton sharply. Her aspect was so aggressive, not to say intimidating, that George Blossom was involuntarily reminded of the last time that bony hand had seized upon him from behind, just as he was about to pocket a particularly luscious sweeting.

He hesitated diplomatically. "Perhaps I'd better call again," he said, with a propitiatory smile. "I don't want to take your time, Abby."

"I've got time a-plenty to hear what your errant is in this 'ere house," she told him incisively. "I've heerd you're gittin' to be a terrible smart, pushin' business man, George; but I guess we'll try an' make out 'ithout any paintin' an' paperin' this spring." Abby Whiton smiled grimly at the discomfited expression in the young fellow's gray eyes.

"Not this spring," she repeated decidedly. "W'y, I wouldn't go through the mess of it ef you was to pay me! I know what it is to hev paint-pails in ev'ry corner, an scraps of paper tracked all over the place. So you might's well——"

"Oh, good-morning, Mr. Blossom," called a clear, little voice from overhead. "I thought I heard you speak. Won't you walk right in; Abby will take your coat and umbrella. I'll be down at once."

"Fer the lan's sake!" ejaculated Abby Whiton with a scandalized sniff, "Ef she ain't opened her window an' stuck her head right out in the rain! She'll git her death; that's what she'll git."

"Oh, I guess not," opined Mr. Blossom cheerfully. "She had on a shawl, you know." He stepped into the hall with a confident and masterful air, before which Abby Whiton, involuntarily retreated kitchenward.

"Here, you c'n give me yer umberell, an' that wet coat o' yourn," she remarked acidly. "I'll hang 'em in the wood-shed to drip a spell. I guess I'll hev to step upstairs an' see what Miss Cynthy's up to now!"

As to the exact nature of the interview which took place between mistress and maid above stairs George Blossom could only guess, as he waited for what seemed an interminable length of time in the sepulchral hall. He gave vent to a low, apprehensive whistle, as an occasional excited accent reached his attentive ears. "Jiminy! I hope she's game!" he murmured.

Two successive slams of two distant doors appeared to terminate the engagement, and presently Miss Cynthia came down the stairs. Her cheeks were flushed, and her blue eyes shone with the light of hard-won victory; she looked young, almost girlish in her slim, black dress. George Blossom sprang to his feet with a little exclamation of inquiring sympathy.

"No, I'm not sick," Miss Cynthia told him decidedly. "But I was so tired I overslept—for the first time in years. I'm not used to being out doors, you know. When I awoke I found Abby had brought my breakfast upstairs. Now we'll look at the papers, for I'd like you to begin to-morrow."

"I suppose you'll make a thorough, complete job of it," observed George Blossom, glancing critically about the dingy walls of the room they entered. "There'll be some plastering to be done where the cracks are bad, and it'll make considerable trouble, first and last. The carpets 'll have to be taken up and the furniture moved."

"I'm ready for anything," declared Miss Cynthia, the flush returning to her cheeks and the sparkle to her eyes. "I'll hire a woman, and a man, too, if necessary. Abby Whiton's going to leave."

"Whew!" exclaimed Mr. Blossom. Then he laughed outright. "I got her that time," he exulted boyishly.

"She's going right off—to-day," went on Miss Cynthia, with a dubious, little quaver in her defiant voice. "I—I shall be quite alone in the house. I—I don't know whether——"

"I can get you a girl," said George Blossom confidently. "Mother 'll be sure to know of somebody. I'll ask her. We'll have a girl here by night; see if we don't."

Then the sample-books were spread out in all the bewildering array of their dazzling possibilities. Miss Cynthia strove vainly to picture to herself a green parlor and a yellow hall in striking juxtaposition; a blue dining-room coupled crudely with a pink sitting-room; bed-rooms festooned with mammoth pink roses climbing over impossible lattice-work; papered ceilings in vast designs of gilded scrolls and arabesques; mouldings and borders in endless variety. She became gradually pale and depressed, and all the while the youthful and inexperienced George discoursed volubly of the style and elegance of his papers, and the astonishing changes which said papers would produce when applied to the walls of the old Breyfogle house.

"I—I don't know," murmured Miss Cynthia faintly. "I'm afraid I'd feel strange with things so—so different. These roses, now, and this scroll-work. Someway I feel all mixed up, and my head——"

Mr. Blossom stared at her in vague alarm. "Say!" he blurted out. "I oughtn't to have showed you all these books at once. Mother says they're enough to turn the brain of a saint. She couldn't pick out a paper for our parlor to save her life. I had to do it myself, and now she wishes it was different."

Miss Cynthia sighed apprehensively. She appeared to be listening furtively to the distant sounds of strong, decided footfalls which passed to and fro with dread regularity. "It's Abby," she explained, in a small, weak voice. "I suppose she's packing her things."

Miss Cynthia was struggling bravely with a depressing belief that the foundations of her little world were about to be terribly shaken, if not altogether removed. She realized abjectly that she had brought this unlooked-for cataclysm upon herself; that it was a direct result of her own rash acts. For the moment she longed to dismiss George Blossom with his terrible sample-books. She could then humbly capitulate before Abby Whiton's entrenchments, and everything would go on as before—till—till——.

"Of course, I don't wan't Abby to stay after all she said," she syllabled faintly. "But——"

At this crucial moment Mr. Blossom deposited his sample-books upon the floor with a decided thud. "It's clearing off," he said abruptly; "the sun's out now. If you'll let me, I'm going to bring the phaeton around and take you over to mother's to dinner; then we'll hunt a girl this afternoon. What do you say? I won't be ten minutes."

"Oh, I don't believe I could," faltered Miss Cynthia; "your mother wouldn't be expecting me, and——"

"She asked me to bring you," declared George Blossom, mendaciously. "She said she hadn't see you for years, to speak to. She was so surprised and pleased when I told her you'd given me such a splendid job. I told her about our ride yesterday, and she said she really wished she could have a good talk with you."

The last part of this statement was strictly true, and the young man's tone was so hearty and convincing, his gray eyes so kind and reassuring, that Miss Cynthia, her little courage quite exhausted, looked up at him gratefully. "I'll go," she said. Then her face fell. "I shall have to stay and see Abby off," she faltered. "I must settle with her, and——"

"Leave her money on the table, and a note telling her to put the key under the door-mat," promptly advised the sapient George. "I guess there aren't any fond last words coming to her, if she talked to you as I expect she did."

And this hard-hearted suggestion Miss Cynthia weakly followed to the letter.

The Crusade Against Swearing

REV. ROLAND D. SAWYER

IT is now over six years since the Rev. Roland D. Sawyer, then a pastor at Brockton, Mass., shocked by the number of profane people in the towns and cities about him, resolved on a crusade against swearing. He started an agitation which resulted in the formation, in 1901, of the first Anti-Profanity League at Hanson, Mass. Others were quickly organized, and there are now thousands in the membership of many auxiliary leagues and the crusade is carried into every State. Hundreds of pastors are now preaching against profanity. Mr. Sawyer's organization has stimulated a like effort in England. The League is constantly sending out literature on the subject of profanity. It issues a "curse card," which says, "Being desirous of breaking myself of the detestable habit of swearing, and feeling the need of a constant reminder to assist me in this determination, I promise to carry, post in some conspicuous place, or otherwise make such disposal of this card, that it shall continually remind me not to swear. Further, if I break this resolve, I will, for any and every oath uttered, pay a fine of five cents, to be sent to the publisher of this card, to be used for the publication of anti-profanity literature." It is a small red and conspicuous card, neatly printed, and is doing its work. A man in business says, "My office mate swore. He promised to desist if I could help him to break the habit. I posted the card over his desk. The first night I got twenty-five cents and he has not sworn since." Another card has, "Please do not swear here. There are those about you that hold sacred the names you so lightly use. Think how it sounds to them. Respect their feelings."

The League has circulated over a quarter of a million cards and printed articles. Rev. J. L. Withrow, D.D., a former moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly, is the national president of the League.

MEN AND WOMEN OF THE HOUR

EX-SENATOR CANNON — MISS MARGARET HALEY — MISS ANNA B. MILLER — MINISTER BOWEN

Ex-Senator Frank J. Cannon of Utah, has been formally excommunicated by the Mormon Church. Mr. Cannon is the editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, and for some time he has been criticizing the acts of the Mormon elders. He was brought before the bishops, and instead of retracting what had been printed in his paper, he boldly declared: "I do not think that Joseph F. Smith is a prophet of God: I think his idol is Mammon. I think he is falsely leading the Mormon people." Mr. Cannon's expulsion has excited great indignation among the younger members of the Mormon Church.

Miss Margaret Haley is the president of the National Teachers' Federation, and business representative of the Chicago Federation. She gained public approval several years ago by forcing tax-dodging public utility corporations in Chicago, to pay to the city $600,000. She has organized the school teachers all over the country, and a short time ago went to New Jersey to aid the teachers of that State in their fight for better conditions. Miss Haley is a great organizer and a good debater, and has shown herself capable of defending the organization of which she is the head.

Minister Bowen represents the interests of the United States in Venezuela. As that South American Republic, under the erratic leadership of President Castro, is constantly getting into trouble with other nations, Mr. Bowen's position is one calling for a firm hand. His ability as a diplomat is as well appreciated in Europe as it is in America. While the United States has no idea of acting as a debt collector in South America, it does intend to have President Castro live up to his treaty obligations.

Miss Anna B. Miller, a school-teacher of Philadelphia, has proved herself a second Portia. Two years ago, as the result of an alleged conspiracy, she lost her position, and was unable to obtain any redress. Poor and without friends, she could get no lawyer to take up her case; but her courage did not fail. She began the study of law in order to defend her position in the world. She sued her detractors for damages, and conducted her case so well, as to amaze the lawyers who were gathered in the court-room. The jury took into consideration, evidently, every measure of damages, that she was entitled to recover.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. D. M. E., California. "How boundless is His love and mercy. I would that all might learn to carry everything to Him in prayer."

L. F. M. "During the past week the Lord has answered my prayers to be helped, in a matter I thought hopeless. I thank him for his goodness."

Mrs. J. H. B., Missouri. "O, what a blessed thing it is to keep in touch with God through prayer. He is my greatest comfort in time of trouble, and I know that in him I can safely trust."

Grateful, New Jersey. "We had a dear little one who was very sick. We prayed earnestly for his recovery. Our prayers were answered, and our faith in prayer has been increased."

A Fall River Reader. "I want to acknowledge the speedy reply to my prayers, and to encourage everyone to put their faith and trust in Him who is always ready to help and comfort us."

Mrs. B. H. H., Tennessee. "The Saviour says, 'When ye seek me with your whole heart ye shall find me.' The answer may not come my way or your way, but it is sure to come, for his promises never fail. I have had my prayers answered sometimes in such a wonderful way that it seemed a perfect revelation to me of God's love."

A Reader, Illinois. "I want to give my testimony to the truth that God answers prayer. In a service of over sixty years I have had many remarkable answers to prayer."

An Opportunity for Service

An opportunity for effective Christian service is offered by the Utah Gospel Mission in its Western field work. During the year 1904 its missionaries visited nearly 10,000 families, and had about 17,000 people at its services. For the year beginning about June next it will require several new men, and wishes to learn of volunteer workers, who are qualified to present fundamental truths well, either in public address or conversation; to sing Gospel hymns, and, if possible, to play the organ. Candidates for volunteer work may write the Secretary, Rev. John D. Nutting, 739 Republic Street, Cleveland, O. All expenses incurred during the work are provided by the organization.

A Romance of the Settlement

IN the list of resident workers at the University Settlement Society of New York, appears the name of Mr. J. G. Phelps Stokes, and among the names of the "workers," is that of Miss Rose Harriet Pastor. Much of romantic interest at present surrounds these two names, the first borne by a scion of one of the wealthiest and proudest old families of New York; the other, by a young woman of Jewish birth, and who is known as the "Poetess of the Ghetto."

Mr. Stokes has been known for several years as a most enthusiastic student of social conditions in the city's congested districts, and he occupies an influential position in many charitable and reform movements, inaugurated for the betterment of the poor. In a recent article upon "The Problem of Vice," Mr. Stokes says:

Where prevalent suggestive influences are bad, whether in the tenements or in the streets or elsewhere, the occasional development of vicious habits is but a natural consequence. If we would prevent the development of vice, we must better the conditions which induce it.

ROSE HARRIET PASTOR

J. G. PHELPS STOKES

With this laudable object in view, the rich young man gave up the splendor of Fifth Avenue, and all social allurements of the exclusive society to which the position of his family entitled him, and went down among the very poor to live. Here he could study their wretchedness and misery, and here also, he could acquaint himself with the many sturdy virtues, which survive even when choked by long hours of underpaid toil and the herd-like life of the tenements.

Wasting disease, ending in premature death, are not the result of merely old age and normal wear and tear, but are directly traceable to what this young worker calls "preventable conditions," and he is putting all his youthful energies into plans to bring about results which will give opportunity for the development of all that is best in body, character and soul of the people among whom he works.

Not very long ago, Rose Pastor was employed in a factory in Cleveland, O., but while she worked hard and fast at this mechanical employment to support herself and her younger brothers and sisters, the busy brain was creating, and the soul growing, reaching out into that world where there is so much sorrow, pain and poverty, which even then, with her limited means, she tried to assuage. The keynote of her life seemed to be an all-embracing love of humanity. No living creatures could fall so low but Rose would try to help them. At whatever time of day or night a case of suffering was brought to her attention, she followed it up, and did what she could.

Two years ago Miss Pastor came to New York, and became a reporter and special writer on the Jewish Daily News. As a representative of this paper she called upon Mr. Stokes, to get information relative to his work in the Ghetto. He was very much attracted by the article which she wrote. In a short time, Miss Pastor was throwing herself, heart and soul, into Settlement work, having left the newspaper for this broader field of endeavor. Conscientiousness of purpose and devotion to duty, seem to be the mainsprings in this remarkable girl's life. In the Settlement, she has organized and directed a number of girls' clubs, all with a practical uplifting aim in view. All that is best in life, all that makes it worth living, all her religion and love for humanity, seem to be summed up in these lines from her pen.

What I live for, but for this
Into the soul to breathe the soul of sweetness:
The stunted growth to rear to fair completeness
Drown tears in smiles; kill hatred with a kiss.

Those who know her best say that money and position, which her marriage with Mr. Stokes will bring to her, will not in any wise spoil this earnest, big-souled woman. Miss Pastor is a remarkable looking young woman, with beautiful soft brown eyes, and heavy dark hair, where little stray gleams of sunlight seem to be chasing each other through its wavy masses. Speaking of her plans for the future, she said, that after the marriage (which would probably take place on July 15th), "we will return to take up our work on the East Side of New York. It is uncertain just where we will live, but it will not be far from the Settlement House.

"I do not look upon prosperity as the world looks at it," said she. "To most persons it means material advantages—money. But the only true success is that which is spiritual. That alone can bring happiness. It is what one is that counts, not the advantages which the world holds dear. Blessed are those who live but to bless."

MARY SARGENT HOPKINS.

A Bowery Mission Concert

NOT since the beloved Bowery Mission organist's place became vacant, and death claimed the gifted Victor Benke, have the walls of the Mission echoed to such beautiful strains as were drawn from the instrument at one of the "Pleasant Saturday Evenings" not long ago. Mr. J. Granville Smith of England, having recently arrived in this country, gave his services upon this evening, for the poor men of the Bowery. Mr. Smith is an organist of rare ability, and plays with such expression and deep feeling as to make the most profound impression upon the listener. His rendering of "Home, Sweet Home" with variations, caused many a poor fellow to wipe his eyes, as he thought of the old home he had not seen for years, and perhaps would never see again. Mr. Smith's command of the organ was shown in the perfect control of its complicated mechanism, from the soft whisper, like a mellow, human voice, to the full organ, which gave in its grandeur the most soul-thrilling harmony. Mr. Smith is, without doubt, a great acquisition to the world of music in New York, and he hopes to soon be settled in a church position, where his talents and long experience entitle him to be. He has held a number of appointments as organist and choir-master in some of the leading churches in England and upon the Continent. Mr. Smith is not only master of the organ, but is a sound theoretical musican, and a composer of no mean ability, having been a contributor to the "Hymnal Companion," and several other collections of Church Music.

Beautify Your Home

"YOU CAN DO IT YOURSELF"

"Then why should you allow a single piece of your furniture to remain scratched or marred when at a trifling outlay you can make it look new, elegant and stylish! Let me tell you how I do it!" "With 'AD-EL-ITE' Paint and Varnish Remover I instantly remove varnish shellac, wax, stains, or paint from my furniture, woodwork and floors, without injuring my hands or the finest woods or veneers in the least. I allow the Varnish Remover to stand about three minutes until it raises the varnish and then I wipe the old varnish off clean to the wood with a rag or cotton waste. As soon as the surface is dry I apply AD-EL-ITE One-Coat Dull Finish, which dries very quickly, and in less than two hours' time I have transformed an unsightly piece of furniture into a useful article, finished in the latest approved style—The Popular Mission Finish. AD-EL-ITE One-Coat Dull Finishes are made in eight beautiful shades, of which I can take my choice; Black and Brown Flemish Oak, Colonial Oak, Light, Medium and Dark Weathered Oak, Bog Oak, and Natural Oak. These are the artistic, soft, velvety dull finishes, which are now being so extensively used for Dining Rooms, Libraries, Halls, Furniture, and all Interior Woodwork. They may be applied to either hard or soft wood, and require but one coat to make a permanent and beautiful finish."

Beautify Your Home. $5.00 worth of AD-EL-ITE preparations will beautify your home surroundings more than $50.00 spent in new furniture and painters' work.

THE MEASURING ROD

I DREAMED that I was on my way to school, when suddenly I noticed a great crowd upon the green. People were hurrying to and fro, and when I asked what all this commotion was about, a girl said, "Why, don't you know? It's measuring day, and the Lord's angel has come to see how much our souls have grown since last measuring day."

"Measuring day," said I, "measuring souls! I never heard of such a thing," and began to ask questions; but the girl hurried on, and after a while I let myself be pressed along with the crowd to the green.

There, in the centre, on a kind of a throne under the great elm, was the most glorious and beautiful being I ever saw. He had white wings; his clothes were a strange shining sort of white, and he had the kindest and yet most serious face I had ever beheld. By his side was a tall golden rod fastened upright in the ground, with curious marks at regular intervals.

Over it, on a golden scroll, were the words, "The measure of the stature of a perfect man." The angel held in his hand a large book, in which he wrote the measurements as the people came upon the calling of their names in regular turns. The instant each one touched the golden measure a most wonderful thing happened. No one could escape the terrible accuracy of that strange rod. Each one shrank from or increased to his true dimensions—his spiritual dimensions as I soon learned, for it was an index of the soul's growth which was shown in this mysterious way, so that even we could see with our eyes what otherwise the angel alone could have perceived.

The first few who were measured after I came I did not know, but soon the name Elizabeth Darrow was called. She is the president of the Aid for the Destitute Society, you know, and she manages ever so many other societies too, and I thought, "Surely, Mrs. Darrow's measure will be very high indeed." But as she stood by the rod, the instant she touched it she seemed to grow shorter and shorter, and the angel's face grew very serious as he said, "This would be a soul of high stature, if only the zeal for outside work which can be seen of men, had not checked the lowly, secret graces of humility and trust and patience under little trials. These, too, are needed for perfect soul-growth."

The next was Lillian Edgar, who dresses so beautifully that I have often wished I had such clothes and so much money. The angel looked sadly at her measure, for it was very low, so low that Lillian turned pale as death, and her beautiful clothing no one noticed at all, for they were quite overshadowed by the glittering robes beside her. And the angel said in a solemn tone: "Oh, child, why take thoughts for raiment. Let your adorning be not outward adorning of putting on of apparel, but let it be the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. Thus only can you grow like the Master."

Old Jerry, the cobbler, came next—poor, old, clumsy Jerry—but as he hobbled up the steps, the angel's face fairly blazed with light, and he smiled on him, and led him to the rod. And behold! Jerry's measure was higher than any of the others. The angel's voice rang out so loud and clear, that we all heard it saying: "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted. Whosoever shall humble himself as a little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."

And, then, oh my name came next! I trembled so that I could hardly reach the angel, but he put his arm around me and helped me to stand by the rod. As soon as I touched it, I felt myself growing shorter and shorter, and though I stretched and stretched and strained every nerve to be as tall as possible, I could only reach Lillian's mark—Lillian's, the lowest of all. I grew crimson with shame, and whispered to the angel: "Oh, give me another chance before you mark me in the book so low as this! Tell me how to grow! I will do it all so gladly, only do not put this mark down!"

The angel shook his head sadly: "The record must go down as it is, my child. May it be higher when I next come! This rule will help thee: 'Whatsoever thou doest, do it heartily as to the Lord, in singleness of heart as unto Christ.' The same earnestness which thou throwest into other things, will, with Christ's help, make thee grow in grace."

And with that I burst into tears, and I suddenly awoke and found myself crying. But, oh! I shall never forget that dream! I was so ashamed of my mark.

BUY Kinloch
READY TO MIX — NOT READY MIXED
HOUSE PAINT

If you intend to have painting done this Spring consider just a minute. Ready-mixed paint is not the best paint to use — not because the material isn't good, but because paint necessarily loses "life" in the ready-mixed can by deterioration and because the oil becomes stale. Fresh, Pure, Raw Linseed Oil mixed with the thick KINLOCH paint pigment (as shown in the illustration) means that the paint is RIGHT — full of life and the best your money can buy.

It's a small matter in the beginning to specify "KINLOCH PAINT" and it's a big matter at the end of 5 years or more to find the KINLOCH PAINT still in good condition.

Send for our book, "What the House Owner Ought to Know." It's an eye opener on paint, and gives some interesting information of great value which will save you $$. Your dealer will supply you. If not, write for our special Introductory Offer.

The Christian's Exercise

ONE of the most impressive petitions in the Saviour's High Priestly prayer is that in which Christ pleads, not that his people be taken out of the world, but that they be kept from the evil. It was not his wish that they enter into a monastery and devote their lives to meditation and to prayer. He wanted them to be in the world, yet not of it, to live the Christian life in the world's hurry and toil. This is a difficult task, yet it is best for the Christian himself, and it is best for the world.

In the world the Christian learns that Christ's religion is a practical religion. He is not to have his mind concentrated on heaven and its glories. He is to do his duty in this life—to do it more conscientiously, more thoroughly, more efficiently, than if he were not a Christian. He should be a better employee, a better employer, a better citizen, a better son, a better father, through his being a Christian. The old story of the servant, who on being asked for evidences of the change that conversion had wrought in her, answered that she now swept under the mats, is a specimen of a principle that goes all through life. The other-worldliness that would so characterize a Christian as to unfit him for daily duty, is no part of Christ's ideal. There are, it is true, occupations in which it is impossible to serve Christ, but those occupations are bad in themselves. In ordinary business, there are no reasons why the Christian should not succeed as well as the unbeliever. The shams and misrepresentations which bring a certain advantage are a bad foundation even for a worldly success. Apart from Christian principle, immorality and deceit bring their own punishment. The Christian loses nothing by not stooping to them. Honesty and integrity are appreciated in the world, and bring a sure reward; the worlding is wise who adopts them from policy, and the Christian who adopts them as principles is at no disadvantage.

It is true that in the world the Christian encounters temptations which would not assail him in retirement; but when he overcomes them, he gains by the conflict. His faith ceases to be a matter of theory and becomes his life. The fidelity that has never been tried, the virtue that has never been tested, lacks the vigor that comes from resistance. The tree on the hill-side is stronger for the winds and storms that threatened to uproot it. It has been compelled to send its roots down deep and spread them wide, to maintain its standing. It is to him that overcometh that Christ's promises are made. Let no man think that his struggle is wasted. Even when he has fallen, if he will rise and renew the fight, he is the better for the battle. God might have made it easier to be good, but he has chosen to subject the Christian to trial and hardship, that out of it all he may produce a stalwart race strong in his strength, a race triumphant over sin and temptation.

It is also better for the world that the Christian should not be withdrawn from it, but should live in it, permeating its evil with the power of his good. It sees in him how secular pursuits may be ennobled and elevated by a sublime faith. In his gentleness, his disinterestedness, his patience and forbearance, it sees a man superior to others. As the world saw in Christ a character which it has never ceased to admire, so in proportion as the Christian mirrors him, it recognizes his excellence. It may sneer at him, it may traduce him, but it perceives that he has a peace of which it knows nothing, and a power of endurance which it cannot understand. The Christian is the light of the world, not to be hidden or to be segregated, but to be in the world a revelation of God in human life. In every community such men are to be found, doing the ordinary work of every-day life from high motives, serving Christ and living for him. Their influence is the salt of society and the light of life.

It is not such men who are worried by doubts or doctrinal difficulties. Christ keeps his promise to them, that they who do his will shall know of the doctrine. They are content to leave the higher mysteries to a future solution. They have faith in his guidance, and following his will as they understand it, await in confidence the further light which he will give in his good time.

The Indwelling Presence

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN his last discourse and prayer with his disciples, our beloved Lord brought out unforgetable truths, and just those which, when they were broken and humbled, the Holy Spirit could bring back to them with living power. "I am the true Vine." "From me is thy fruit found." "In him was life;" but now he tells of that life as being shared by his own disciples: "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he (the Father, the Husbandman) taketh away, and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." O how blessed! We know by experience our powerlessness. We would be like Christ: we would serve God, but we try, and find no stability in ourselves, no wood, no power to stand, nothing on which we can depend, nothing on which anything can hang. But like the vine which can cling, we can depend upon another; and this is our vocation, to let him have us, prune us, test us, do what he will with us; on our part only trust, but always trust; only obey, but always obey, and then, from him is our fruit found.

Our only safety is in a constant connection with the vine, a "praying always," and about everything. This is what makes the sap of the life of Christ rise into and quicken the poor little weak branch, and fruit is brought forth; not to our credit, but to his glory. There are so many Christians in whom the savor of Christ is lacking. Such a little thing upsets them; they look on the dark side of things; they cannot help another soul to find Christ, because they themselves are not overflowing with the consciousness of the wonderful love to them; there is no fruit, nothing which serves God's purpose in making him real to those around them. Why is it? They are looking to bring forth fruit through what they are, and through what they know; they are not in close touch with him who is the only Life-power. Nothing else will do but contact with God; it is the only power by which fruit can be brought forth unto God.

How else can we understand the purging of the great Husbandman? When he permits, in our daily life, that we should be thwarted, hindered, misunderstood, etc., how does this work towards bringing forth more fruit, except as in secret converse with God, he explains it to us, and enables us to remain sweet and happy under these tests? This is why he says, "Abide in Me and I in you: as the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can you, except ye abide in me." Wherever we go, if we are his true disciples, we are there to serve him, we do our housework, and care for our children, to serve him. We go down into the mine or work in the fields, or in the office, or in visiting the poor, to serve him, and we cannot serve him successfully except we do all in prayer.

Whatever we do which is not done in the spirit of prayer and praise, is like a rusty, creaking door-hinge, which wants oiling. Why are the children sometimes so tiresome? Perhaps we have not asked the Lord to make them good. There is some hinge which has not been oiled with prayer. We have not been abiding in Christ while cooking the dinner, or while talking with a caller who interrupted us in some important work. If we go to a meeting in a ruffled spirit, we take our unrest into the meeting, instead of taking the holiness, and love, and power of God's presence with us: and our presence does harm instead of good. "He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without me ye can do nothing." "Fruit of love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. 5: 22, 23). And to show how much this fruit is connected with prayer, our Lord continues; "If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." He can trust such with continual answers to their prayers, because intuitively they will with him, and therefore they have the petitions which they have desired of him. As we by grace make common cause with Christ, he makes common cause with us. "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you, continue ye in my love." I shall do nothing to chill your love; see that you do nothing to grieve him.

Should Women Wear Hats in Church?

What Our Readers Have to Say on this All-Absorbing Question

IT was not without some degree of apprehension that we invited our readers to communicate their views on the question, whether or not hats and bonnets should be worn in church. Old customs, venerable traditions, and the "inalienable rights" of the sex to decorate themselves with those wonderful millinery creations, no two alike, which are at once their joy and their perplexity, seemed to warn us off. But the responses, many of them from women, by the bye, furnish convincing evidence that very many of them have come to the same conclusion that the sterner sex has already reached, viz.: That the Church Hat has become a burning question, and that some reform is absolutely necessary, in order that a very large part of the average congregation may be able to see the preacher, and to take a reasonable interest in what is going on upon the platform or pulpit. We give the letters below:

"A Dream of a Bonnet"

AS we sat in the rear seat of our church this morning, there came to us the words of the preacher, as over a haystack. We could not secure a point of vision, from which we could see the speaker, whose text was, strangely enough, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness," and our heart replied, "Eyes have we but we see not." In our isolation we dreamed of a better way to display my lady's millinery. Why not cover the front wall with hooks? Let each lady on entering hand her headdress to the usher, who shall at once place it upon the proper hook in sight of the whole congregation. This will serve several purposes: Each lady paying rent for the hook bearing her name, will make it a source of revenue; it will keep the record of attendance; it will decorate the wall; it will give everyone an opportunity to see the hat—and the preacher. If there is anyone who has mingled feelings unexpressed, it's the man in the back seat at the morning service.

Granville, Ills. W. E. HAWTHORNE.

An Obstacle to Spirituality

IT is a beautiful expression of simple devotion on the part of the women of Denver, who have decided to remove their hats and bonnets during service in the churches. God is glorified in every act of self-denial. Whatever distracts the mind from worship and adoration should be avoided. A hatless congregation is an innovation dearly to be desired, to enhance the beauty and sublimity of the service, and aside from its spiritual value, the human head and face divine are seen at their best when uncovered. This exquisite act of self effacement of Denver's noble Christian womanhood is worthy of emulation.

Berkeley, Calif. (REV.) T. R. GRIFFIN.

A "Mere Man's" Plaint

IF the ladies remove their hats during service, what are they going to do with them when they want to rise for the invocation, and when they want to hold their books in responsive reading and in singing, and when they want to bow their heads during the prayer. Are their thoughts on the prayer or on their hats? And after the services, what? Why, confusion confounded! They have no looking-glass. They say: "Is my hat all right? Why, it just feels terrible!" I do not advocate the removing of hats in church; but if they will only wear hats of suitable proportions, both becoming, neat and tasty, and that do not cost over $18 each, and if the lady who sits in the seat back of me will stop pumping with her fan the cold air on the back of my neck and bald head, all else will be forgiven. E. SEYMOUR BROWN.

Utica, N. Y.

Paul Meant "Veils," Not "Hats"

THERE is one aspect of this question that is very generally misunderstood, I think. Paul, previous to writing his Epistle to the people of Corinth, had been preaching that believers were no longer under law, but under grace. The Christian women of Corinth and Athens, taking encouragement from his words, had come more boldly to the front than at any previous time, both in church and social affairs. There was at that time in the Greek cities a certain class of women who made license of liberty, and it was not becoming that the women of Christian households should follow their example by appearing unveiled in public. So the Apostle warned the women of the church in Corinth that, if they wished to avoid being identified with this "frail sisterhood," they must not adopt their outward dress or manners. Hence his very plain injunction to them not to discard the veil, for there were no hats or bonnets in the question. He saw that the Corinthian women had taken the ground that, in religion, sex distinction was abolished, and that they were claiming equality with men, and he desired to warn the believers among them that the new fashion of unveiling, to assert feminine independence, was pretty sure to be misunderstood; that they were overstepping propriety and making themselves less respected. He wrote not in the sense of rebuke or fault-finding, but by way of kindly warning, just as had he been alive to-day, he might have written to the Christian women of our own country to discard their fearful and wonderful head-gear when they enter the Lord's House, and to come modestly attired, in a manner calculated neither to excite undue attention nor to interfere with the comfort of other worshipers. MARCELLA DENT.

New York City.

Hats in Church are Unnecessary

WHY not? The average hat often obscures the vision of a dozen persons, which is a great annoyance and provocation. The hat is not necessary either for warmth or comfort. In the large church of which I am a member (Robert Burdette's), the ladies now remove their hats — no great casualties result—while scores and scores rejoice because they can say as to the preacher—"One thing I know. Whereas once I was blind, now I see."

Inglewood, Cal. A. H. CARMAN.

Hats Spoil Many a Good Sermon

MANY a deep and inspiring thought of a preacher's sermon has been lost by the twitching of a woman's head, upon which rests a hat of sometimes amazing proportions. To obviate this trouble, let the women remove their hats.

Allegheny, Pa. RUSSELL REVELLE.

Calls the Head-gear "Monstrous"

SINCE Madame Fashion decrees that her followers shall wear the monstrous head-gear now in style, I say, remove it in church by all means. It is certainly no advantage to the wearer, and a decided disadvantage to those who sit behind. Where two or more sit together, it is impossible to get a glimpse of the speaker, and I for one do not care to listen if I cannot see. J. W. DAVIDSON.

Agent G. N. Ry., Blanchard, N.D.

If Doffed at Concert, why not at Church?

I BELIEVE to-day, ninety per cent. of the women church-goers, favor no hats in church. It is surprising how prompt the head-gear is removed at the opera, concerts, etc. In public halls, and even in churches, where lectures or concerts are given, off they come. Why not at the Sunday services? JNO. J. ANKENY.

Minneapolis, Minn.

"No Hats" Reasonable and Consistent

ANY fashion persisted in after the true reason for its adoption has passed away, degenerates into a folly or a mere empty and cumbersome form. The reason for Paul's injunction to Christian women to keep their heads covered in the house of God does not exist under the conditions of present American civilization. Hats were primarily designed and are needed only as a protection for the head. Hence, hats worn indoors are worn for some purpose wholly apart from the original intention. The Creator of all things never divorces use and beauty. Every created thing is at once beautiful and has a reason for being. There is no "use" for hats when their owners are under cover. Persistence in this fashion has caused an abnormal evolution in hat-wearing—an endeavor to turn a thing of use and beauty into a thing of beauty alone. By this, thousands of women are compelled—or think they are—to conform to the "Sunday hat" folly. The result is that the preacher has to talk to souls over and past and between and despite hat brims and waves. He whom we worship in the church building, regards the attitude of the soul. The spiritually-discerning must concede that millinery has been a serious hindrance to the souls of women, and possibly men—for reasons too numerous to list in this connection. "Hats off" in church is reasonable and consistent.

(MRS.) ADA MELVILLE SHAW.

Chicago, Ill.

Are Church Dressing-rooms Needed?

I THINK hats would much better be left on. The first thing to be considered is the way in which a lady's hat is adjusted, requiring two or three pins, and quite a little time is required to comfortably and safely adjust it. Thus it would require a cloak or dressing-room, in which were a number of mirrors, to enable the ladies to remove their hats and to put them on again, detracting a great deal from the thoughts and purposes for which they came into the house of God, and as the services usually last very little more than an hour, why should they take the trouble, as there is no place in the pew in which to store the hats. Besides, if they were removed in the vestibule, it would necessitate the male escort waiting until the lady removed her hat and rearranged her coiffure, while those moments could be much better spent in quietly sitting in meditation in the pew. All this I know by experience. MRS. L. J. W.

Wooster, O.

Why the Preacher Was Invisible

CERTAINLY they should so dress the hair, that they can remove the hats during service. Last Sunday, I was seated by the usher of one of the finest uptown churches, in a pew in the middle aisle, about the middle of the auditorium. Before me sat two very finely dressed ladies, with umbrella hats and feather decorations. I heard a most excellent sermon, but could not see the preacher's face during the delivery. At least two-thirds of the audience were in the same predicament. Hats off, and all could see the face and expression of the minister. Certainly ladies should so dress their hair, as to remove the hats during service. ALBERT B. WHITNEY, M.D.

New York City.

Hats Hide the Preacher from View

MY view is that women should not wear their hats in church, and especially in the rural districts, where the latest modeled churches do not exist, and where seats are not elevated. To sit behind a woman wearing the present style of headgear, prohibits an individual from seeing the preacher in the pulpit, unless they stand up. R. B. GOODE.

Abingdon, Va.

The Disadvantages of Hat-wearing

"BY all means, let the woman sit hatless in the churches, or wear a small head covering." So says the head of our family. He whispers, in parenthesis—that the wonderful creations in millinery in the first, second, third, and fourth pews ahead, encourage profanity; "divert attention from the sacred duties of the hour," and cause chronic rheumatism of the neck, in the vain endeavor to keep at least one eye on the preacher. MRS. C. A. VAN W.

Scranton, Pa.

Does She Doff Dignity With the Hat?

IF we were considerate of other's comfort, I think we would go without hats in church. At a Bible reading recently, sitting back of two ladies with hats on, I was unable to see the speaker. It seems a pity to have a lecture or entertainment spoiled for others, on account of a hat. Yet I think when a woman takes off her hat in church, she, at the same time, removes some of her dignity:

Say, what you will—
They'll wear them still!

Troy, N. Y. MRS. A. D. EGLESTON.

They Interfere With Soul-Saving

I THINK women should remove hats and bonnets in church, because: 1. They detract much from the comfort and pleasure of those unfortunate enough to sit behind them; and certainly it is very impolite to knowingly and needlessly deprive others of their rights and comforts. 2. By rendering many of the congregation ill-at-ease, the influence of the preacher over his congregation is weakened. Whatever weakens the influence of the speaker, by that much takes from his power to save souls. I believe that souls might have been saved—that were not saved—by reason of hats and bonnets rendering sinners uncomfortable, and throwing them into ill-humor, and thus destroying the power of the preacher. G. A. F. PARKER.

Hereford, Tex.

Thinks Paul's Advice Was Conclusive

"SHOULD women wear hats in church?" I wish to answer in the affirmative, based on I. Cor. 11: 5-7, saying: "But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoreth her head: for that is even all one as if she were

KOREA IN WAR-TIME

IRONING LINEN IN A KOREAN HOME

ALTHOUGH the Russian-Japanese war still continues in Manchuria, and on the sea, the contending armies have raced northward off the map of Korea, and the people are again adjuing themselves, as near as possible, to their old conditis. In the early part of the conflict the missionaries we supposed to be in dang and a United States warsh was sent to convey them to a place of safety. The fe proved groundless, and my missionaries remained, beg well treated by both the Rsians and the Japanese. Aerican missions have been wderfully successful, conering that the workers are eparatively few in number.

Dr. Wylie D. Forsythe, M.D., of Chunju, Korea, one of our medical missionaries, sels us the following interesng account of the present st us of Christian work in the country: "The twentiet anniversary of the beginig of Protestant mission wk in Korea," he writes, "as celebrated in Seoul, Set. 20, 1904. Many excelle papers, dealing with the vaious phases of the work, we read by Dr. S. A. Moffe, Dr. R. Grierson, Dr. Jnes S. Galy, Rev. W. D. Rnolds, and Dr. W. B. Scanton, Dr. H. G. Underwod gave the following summry of the tangible results of twenty years of Protestant Msions: In Christian education, more than 100 primary scools, 3 academies, and several boarding schools fogirls; a well-equipped mission press turning out Christi literature, 55 books and tracts published and circuld by thousands through mission channels. The New Tstament translated, and work begun on the Old Testamnt; more than 20 medical missionaes at work in some dozen different pces, who receive yearly 50,000 calls fr medical treatment; 3 foreign hospals receiving patients, the Severance Mmorial having just been completed at Seoul at a cost of nearly $20,000, the gi of a generous citizen of Philadelpa; more than 60 foreign evangelists, 8 partially organized churches, with 1000 communicants, 1,100 catechumns, and 40,000 adherents, 2,400 membs having been received the past year. Srely these results, as given by Dr. Underwood, are a cause for great rejoicing and thanksgiving for what God hath one, and they are a wonderful stimus for a greatly increased work in the future.

"Of the various denominations at wk in Korea, Presbyterians have the largest force. The four bodies—Northern, Southern, Canadian and Australian—report a total of 113 foreign, and 267 native workers, 462 regular meeting-places, nearly 9,000 communicants, and 18,400 in Sunday Schools. These Christians gave last year $9,000 gold, for the work, and on account of low wages here, one dollar in gold is equivalent to eight dollars as given in America. Then the progress made by the Methodists is also most encouraging. The Church of England and other denominations are at work. A Young Men's Christian Association is maintained in Seoul.

THE FRUIT MARKET IN KOREA'S CAPITAL

"Bible study forms a prominent part of the Korean's Christian life. Classes for instruction are held at various places every year. These classes last two weeks usually, and those who attend bring rice or money to help in paying their expenses. Some students come from great distances. One little boy last year started to walk more than a hundred miles to such a class. His companions had to carry the little fellow part of the way, but at the session he was among the most diligent students. These classes train leaders for home service. Family worship is almost universal in the humble homes of the Christians, nor is public worship neglected. 'Seven hundred at prayer-meeting on a rainy night,' was the message sent to America not long ago from Pyeng Yang, in the north.

"Such is the progress of the Gospel after twenty years, and when it is remembered that missionaries worked thirty-seven years in China, and nearly ten years in Japan, before the first convert was baptized, the results are yet more wonderful.

"While so much has been accomplished, compared with the great needs, only a beginning has been made. Woman's position is one of degradation. Demon worship, Confucianism, Buddhism, superstition and ignorance, hold millions of the people in the awful bondage of sin and death. The Gospel brings light and life. Great is the joy of deliverance from this bondage through faith in Christ. All the missions need reinforcements. Large sections are practically untouched for lack of workers. Medical work from the first has been greatly blessed, and yet there are only some twenty medical missionaries among the twelve million people, while in New York City alone, there are five thousand physicians.

GROUP OF MISSIONARIES AND NATIVE CHRISTIANS

"Christians in Korea are uniting in prayer for the presence of the Holy Spirit in power, in the lives of all the followers of Christ working his will in them, and using them for his glory.

"Surely when nations are fighting fiercely for the physical possession of Korea, when the land is being bought with the blood of tens of thousands of brave men, the hearts of Christian people will be moved until a great volume of intercessory prayer shall go up daily before the Father's throne, that the King of kings and Lord of lords shall seize this land for his own, and speedily reign in the hearts and lives of those whom he hath redeemed with his blood on Calvary."

How to Endure

TEXT—HEBREWS 11: 27

"He endured, as seeing him who is invisible"

A NATION is said to be humanity on a large scale. Certain it is that you may profitably study the human soul in a more ample atmosphere if you direct your attention to a whole people or the race. The lines come out more vividly. It is of the greatest advantage when you may study both its typical man and his nation together, especially when their features, and energies, and limitations are revealed as they confront a common problem, and when they thus move before you, each influencing the other toward a common destiny. When we thus study them, as we study Moses and the Hebrew people, we soon perceive that what makes a great leader for a nation, will make a great nation for him to lead.

We will not forget that we are a long way anterior to the Christ's vision of Divine Fatherhood, when we think of Moses, and his age, and his problem as to duty and God. But if we have grasped earlier truth, we will see all later truth come out of it. This man Moses, if he gets hold of truth, will inevitably prophesy Jesus Christ, who shall come with more truth about God, for it is not Moses' truth and Jesus' truth, but it is truth—all truths being one. God is not superior to his revelation of Himself in man as a being made in his image, even if we cannot step from Moses to Jesus, and speak of man as God's son, realizing his life in the Fatherhood of God. His right to rule us abides on the ground of a common moral perception between us. Beneath it all is the confidence that in the long run, what ought to be must be.

Gradation of Power

This view of your prerogative and mine, this confidence in the sincerity of the challenge which the Unseen Power of the universe offers to our faculties of appreciation, is in harmony with a vitalizing and conquering faith. It is a faith that works itself out in this way, sometimes; we first realize that what we respect and obey as power manifests itself in the universe as physical; that is, it is brawn and bone. A little later, perhaps a long time later, we begin to see that brawn and bone are under the dominion of brain. Real power, finer and higher power, comes of brain or through brain. Thinkings make and remake things. Latest of all, do we realize that the highest and most efficient power is neither physical nor mental, but moral. The issue lies not in what brawn may determine, neither does it lie in what brain decides, but it lies in what conscience says. "What ought to be?" is the all-inclusive question. As wisdom is a greater energy than mere power, so righteousness is a greater energy than mere wisdom.

A Moses can never do the work of a Moses in the world until there are sanctions for the laws which proceed out of the plans and purposes of the Infinite—yea, such sanctions as that when they are spoken they have their undoubted echo in his own character. A faith that has power in it for life's crises and its tasks is a faith which comes of character resting upon character. Nobody has lived far into the life which is possible to a man without realizing this. I do not deny that this seems to put an awful, and almost perilous, jurisdiction in the hands of human reason; but if man is to live a reasonable life, he must believe that this is a reasonable universe; if he is to live a wise life, he must believe that it is a universe embodying wisdom; if he is to live a good life, he must believe that it is a good universe. If he is to believe any of these things, the Supreme and Infinite Mastery which gives laws to his life and appeals to his consciousness must at least seem to him to be the Reason, and Wisdom, and Goodness behind and in all things. This alone will be his God.

The Supreme Problem

I urge you to-day to look your own task squarely in the face, refusing to underestimate what it teaches of the seriousness of life and its demands upon you. But as you do this, stand sympathetically by this man Moses and see if your problem is not at root his problem. Where am I to get enduring power? What did his vision of God do for him and through him toward the civilization of himself and the civilization of the people whom he influenced? This will be for us to ask searching questions of our idea of God and its effect upon us.

The author of the letter to the Hebrews tells us that it was Moses' vision of the invisible which gave him power to endure. "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible." This quality of endurance goes deep and has a comprehensive hold upon the entire character of a man. Endurance is not the effluence of some one beacon-like faculty. It is not the manifestation of what we call genius. It belongs oftener to the less brilliant of the children of men. Moses was no more a genius than was Washington or Alfred. No separate faculty, or federation of several faculties, stood out and reigned in that partial and weird splendor which amazes us in Napoleon or fascinates us in Alexander. Yet these other plainer men are the men who endured through their life here, and the streams of their influence are more enduringly potent to-day than they ever were before.

Resources of Endurance

The truth is, that the most profound and inclusive question to be raised with reference to the greatest of the servants of mankind is this, how did he endure? And if you can obtain a sight of the hidden resource by which he was enabled just to last through it all, or stand it, as we say, till his work was done, you have the secret of the man revealed in the power that made him, and the secret of the power that made the man disclosed in its product—the man himself.

How shall human capacities and faculties be thus formed into a squadron of power? How shall all of a man be organized or reorganized? I do not doubt that this is the first personal problem which is encountered by every such a man as Moses. We see his weakness in his apparently most brilliant moment, when impulse was not associated with idea, when passion was unrelated to principle, and he slew the Egyptian slave-master. He did not lack intense and vigorous abilities, but he lacked self-organization and self-sovereignty. No human soul ever obtained these—self-organization and self-sovereignty—without being organized by something whose sovereignty was so unquestioned and commanding that every special power of mind and body hastened into orderly relationship with every other. Then the whole man found himself grandly obedient to the Power which made him powerful, to the Wisdom that made him wise, the Reason that made him reasonable—shall I not say it—to the Goodness that made him good. The greatest of all facts and factors—God—shone down into the soul of this man. The Highest poured his nature into Moses at the highest point in the nature of Moses. That is the point in every man's nature where man's character accepts the character of God as goodness. There, if at all, my friend, God has taken you by the overwhelming presence of himself in human nature, and then you said, "God is good." That is the most determinative sentence a man may speak. Let us see what and how this enabled Moses to endure.

Self-Mastery

He endured himself; he endured other people; he endured facts. But Moses' first problem was with himself. Moses will always stand as the example of those who easily become over-sensitive about the significance of themselves in the sincere effort to get rid of themselves. Introspection, begun in self-abasement, may grow egoism itself. You almost pity the man—for large size never renders a man less worthy of our sympathy—when he wakes to the real problem of himself and finds what is the measure of his possible success or failure, as every man does, in the presence of what God and man are demanding at his hands.

There is a nobility in Moses' first cry, as he surveys the Egypt which he sees from the back of the wilderness, and the Canaan which vaguely lifts itself as a yet unnamed goal before his imagination. "Who am I that I should go unto Pharaoh and bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?" What honest nature worthy to do anything in the way of emancipating men from their slaveries of sin and ignorance has not cried out, "Who am I?"

No other fact can relieve a true man of the burden and embarrassment of his own personality, save one—the personality of God. An impersonal force v scarcely interest him. When Moses said, with sinc self-scrutiny, "Who am I that I should go unto P raoh?" he weighed Pharaoh's personality in opposit to his own. Pharaoh and I—one was in the sc against the other, and it seemed an unequal conte God answered Moses. Another personal pronoun " fell upon the air. It was the I of Almighty God. G said, "Certainly I"—I love that "Certainly" of Goc "Certainly I will be with thee." The I of Mo was lifted and lost sight of, at least for one reveali moment, in the "I" of the God of Israel. How dec edly was Moses delivered from himself! Hear h now. A new question has come up in his mind; the one about himself has gone. The emphasis of the terprise is not now placed upon himself at all. I lesser "I" has vanished; the omniscient "I" alone sovereign and important; and Moses says, "When shall say, The God of your fathers hath sent me ur you; and they shall say to me, What is his nam What shall I say unto them?" Then the Almighty a swered in the gift of a name which was indeed a nan for it was a description of his own nature, "I am that am." "Jehovah."

God of the Past and Present

Every soul passes through these experiences wi God, if that soul is on the way to power. God is n only All-Power, but All-Power with an eternal pr gramme. In his exile in Midian, Moses had found, st more grand and awe-inspiring than ever before, G as the Omnipotent One. The Eternal now binds pas present, and future. A long step had been taken t ward that far-off hour when the greater Jew, whose li was indeed a burning bush, would teach his followe to say, "Our Father who art in heaven," Here w the covenanting God—the supreme God of promise Ask yourself, "Has my Sovereign made me any pron ises? Is there anything promising in his character? there a future which makes the past sacred, God bein in both?" If not, you have not taken the step towar spiritual power which I am trying to persuade you t take.

Moses is spoken of as the meek man. It is a wor whose closer meaning here is "tamed." No tamed ma was ever born so; and no man or set of men, even n woman or set of women, no force or series of forces earth, ever tamed a man. But God himself can tame man; and he tamed Moses into one of the greatest an best of his servants. Were we talking about Moses endurance, and did we say that "he endured as seein Him who is invisible?" Yes; he endured training i the invisible, by the Invisible One, as, for example, i the little burning bush. But you cannot fancy that in tellect, heart, and will being trained by One les supreme over him than the "I am that I am." Intel lectually, this gripped him. He would see more later All greatness tends towards goodness. We must go with him through another crisis to realize that what is in volved in this shall be evolved.

When the ten commandments were carried by Mose down the mountain-path and into the neighborhood o the Hebrew camp, Moses was bearing to them the ex pressed will of God. He himself had risen to the lofty experience of communion with God, so far as God had revealed himself as the "I am that I am." God was no longer a name of Almighty Power, but a power for righteousness in man's life. Law for conduct had come. Jehovah was henceforth the living foe of iniquity, the reason of universal order, the pledge of ultimate, and therefore just, civilization.

A New Crisis

In his ascent to Sinai's crest, Moses had not taken the people along with him, mentally and spiritually. He had been gone for a whole month. Such was the mental and moral altitude of Sinai that the idealist Moses was singularly remote from the Hebrewdom below the mountain summit. Isolation of greatness does not always produce power, even in a Moses. How far and how long he had been absent from them was made startlingly clear to him when he heard music and dancing, and when he saw them repeating the disgusting memories

*From his forthcoming volume of sermons, entitled, Paths to Power.

Egypt, debasing themselves and outraging his fidelity t God. They were actually worshiping the golden calf i an effort to hold to some kind of divinity. This was to much. Moses could not endure it. Down upon the ommon rocks and earth he threw the precious tables of one, and they lay broken in the shadow of the mountain God. So evident and painful was his people's moral aster to the mind of the great commander that his row knew no bounds.

The Broken Tables

But what about his own moral disaster, when he failed t endure? Nothing is more pathetic than his grief as realizes what has been lost not only by their return t the foul god Apis of Egypt, but by his own failure to ld them and to hold himself in the critical hour of t ir national infancy. The wooden framework of the lden calf might be consumed in fire; its golden cover- i might be ground up and the powder strewn upon the ook which flowed from Mount Sinai. Guilty men ght have to drink of it forever, as we always have to dnk up our past. Three thousand men might be slain, a yet—and yet, none of this changed a single reality. Here still was the law. Had it not been broken? No, o ly the tables on which it was written were broken. Here was Moses himself, and here was lawless humanity. Moses will have to go back to the heights of Sinai.

All of this story is the biography of your soul and mine, m dear friend. Read it again in your experience, if yu will willingly again take the next step, which you ed to take to obtain enduring power. It is no more e dent now and here that Moses must have a deeper, r her, and a more commanding vision of God, than ny which has been vouchsafed to him, in order that he ny endure, than it is evident that you must have the s ne, and for the same reason. Moses' failure has been y r failure; and it reveals incapacity for leadership.

Shall I relate your experience? Long ago the loftier e ment in your nature led you out of a certain slavery w ich your soul hated and feared. Like a gang of s ves, the sightless lower elements of your nature fol- l ed along. The higher elements of your nature a beared at times to comprehend and catch the breath o far-off daytime—the worth of liberty. The lower p f complained of the cost. On, over weary days and n hts, your soul traveled as did that Israelitish host, t lower elements of your nature often a little home- s k for Egypt, and muttering discontent. But the a piring quality of your nature still kept control. At last t re came an experience, with conscience. You always b ieved there was the Almighty One to deal with. Then y u rose to the vision of the "I am that I am"—God in t history of the past and that of the future.

Then you were led to Sinai. Sinai was wrapped in thunder-cloud and lit up with flame, as conscience always is. Oh, it is a great hour when the highest faculty of one's soul gets the moral law, God's legislation, which is the utterance of God's plan, revealing God's nature! It is a sublime, if not the sublimest, hour that any man knows when all the qualities of one's nature accept this revelation from conscience, and a man binds himself up with the ideas and purposes which God has for him. But, my dear friend, this did not occur. What did happen? Moses came down out of the mountain and his miserable crowd of stupid Hebrews were in a licentious orgy. We see the frightful distance between the best of one's self and his worst. Is there anything as discouraging as this for the Moses-part of a man? He has failed; they have failed; and the confusion of soul makes us think that even the law has failed, though it has not been tried as yet. Now what is to be done? Prayer and sorrow and pleading all over, Moses must go back to the heights of Sinai; the soul must still have law, in order to have government, and the only law that will command a man's soul must be the revealed will of Him who made man in his own image, so that man could enter into his plan.

The Law and the Lawless

Even the mind of Moses was not comprehensive enough — only the mind of Jehovah, as revealed in Christ, has proved to be comprehensive enough — to hold in one faith and hope both the law and the lawless. But something must be done in that direction. God must be revealed as having a heart toward blundering and sinning humanity. For Moses, without a divine outlook upon mankind, that orgy marked an hour for righteous indignation. He lost heart as well as head, just as you and I have done. God says to him, as he does to us, "Ascend Sinai again. Come alone—for you have been dizzied and confounded by a loud majority. You must realize the power of a minority of one with Me behind it; come up early in the morning."

Oh, blessed moment, when we hear God saying to us, after we have lost the moral law because our lower self has overwhelmed our higher self with shamefulness: "Come up in the morning!" Up—that involves the greatest supposition of ethics. "Up" or "down" morally means right or wrong, and that man is an ethical being. Moses went up obediently. O, the rich experience in going up, in reaching the crevices of the mountain of God? Have you never had it, my brother, the re-giving of the law of God to the same poor hands which threw it down, because your heart had never felt God's heart behind it, and in it all, the goodness of God? Nothing can describe it.

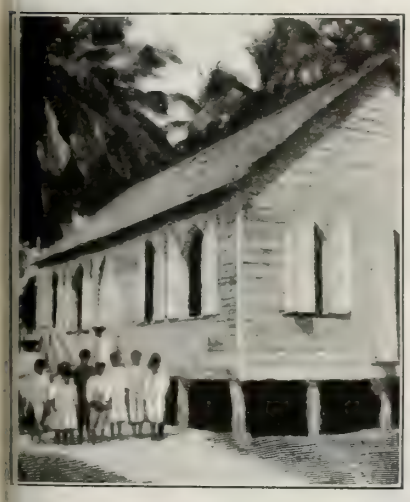
But Moses cannot receive the law again intellectually and spiritually without a larger power to take it—that is the power of faith. Faith is the character's confidence in a character. Moses must be more strongly apprehended of God, gripped by his character, that he may apprehend, grasp, and hold on. He will endure. He will endure, and why? You say your view of God makes little difference with your conduct. It alone makes an infinite difference. Moses will still be Moses, but he will never fail again where the sanction of the law is involved. Hear him pray: "I beseech thee, show me thy glory." The divine answer came: "I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of Jehovah before thee." God did not decline to open this very heart to his servant, and Moses saw goodness reigning there.

Glory in Goodness

Intellect may be satisfied with Absolute Being, "I am that I am." Will may worship the Almighty One; the heart of man will cleave to the good God. Hidden in the cleft of the rock, we are told, that Moses saw the "back" not the face of Him. O what beautiful child-talk this is to the soul! Always the goodness that comes to us in testimony that God is and is gone, to leave His effluence—goodness—elsewhere. But what a moral motive and sustaining power had come to hearten Moses. God's glory is his goodness—not his power, not his continuity, not his wisdom, not even his justice, not even his truth, related as these are in character—but his goodness is the deepest, truest reflection of Jehovah. The "I am that I am," is the revelation of a Being Absolute, Eternal, because He is the All-Good. Moses was leading to Christ, in whom we see that "God is love."

"All law," says Burke, "is benevolence acting by rule." We accept the rule, because of the benevolence which we are persuaded is behind it. That is to say, as history proves, Sinai's utterances are successful in producing morality only by sympathetically attaching the governed to the energy behind the law by which government goes on. Thus this whole event is a Christian triumph, before Christianity was born. Moses was the prophet of Jesus Christ. The law here, in its failure, is a tutor leading to Christ—goodness embodied—Jehovah incarnate. At last we must come to Him. Christ indeed must write God's laws in our hearts. We must have Christ that we may see God's complete revelation of him. Every obedience of higher truth has led to the Incarnate God. Israel saw that God's goodness is his real glory. The nation was assured. They all took heart. "They drank of that spiritual rock which followed them, and that rock was Christ."

A Missionary Tour in Panama



AN ISLAND CHURCH IN PANAMA

WE left Port Limon lately on a banana steamer for a short missionary tour, and arrived at Bocas del Toro (Bull's outh), a province in the new Republic Panama. There we found the people ily at work rebuilding the business part the town, recently destroyed by fire.

Fourteen years ago, we were permitted take up mission work in this district. ere are now three or four churches in e town, representing as many denomina- ons. There are also two Christian En- avor Societies in operation.

On a small gasoline launch, full of col- ed people, we start for a twenty-mile n. For the first nine miles we sailed ross a lovely lagoon, of deep, clear sea-water, surrounded by beautiful islands. Then we entered a canal, nine miles long, through which bananas are brought in lighters towed by launches, to be loaded on ocean steamers at anchor at the mouth of the canal.

Then we go up a beautiful river to the first landing-place, where we remain three days, holding services. A church building is yet unknown here, but a recently erected engine house is fitted up, and boxes and boards form the seats; while large lamps, used for loading bananas at night, give us light at our evening services. The bell used to call the men to work also calls them to worship. The toilers respond in good numbers, but there are few women and children. The men wear little more than trousers and shirts—the most comfortable mode of dress in this intensely hot climate. Our morning service is well attended, but the night meeting is crowded. After a half-hour song service (how these people did sing!) the Word was preached. Earnestness and eagerness were manifested.

The following Sunday we were paddled in a canoe across the lagoon to a settlement near the coast where, for many years, the people have been noted for industry, prosperity, and good conduct. A school and church are responsible for this, which is a striking contrast to other places where there is no school or church. Large numbers gathered, especially young people, in the little church. This place until recently was in Colombia. During the revolution, the government soldiers took possession of the church as a barracks, and used the communion cups to drink their coffee from—mocking the holy ordinance. In a previous revolution they stole the communion set, but were discovered, and the set restored. In the recent revolution the communion service was again stolen, and up to the present time has not been found. The building has many bullet holes. One bullet passed through a hymn book, and another through the organ. The bed I slept on that night had been splintered by bullets. The houses are constructed of wood, built on posts. Under this particular house, I was told that an old inhabitant, almost helpless, had crept for shelter during the fighting. He was discovered and dragged out by the government soldiers, who shot him, and cut off one of his arms. They compelled a neighbor to tie the body, with the arm, to a board, and fling it into the sea, to be devoured by sharks. This place is now in the new Republic of Panama, and under the protection of the United States. The people are returning from hiding in the bush, and are repairing and occupying their damaged houses. The assurance that another revolution will not again take place seems a great relief to their minds. To these people the Word of God was a real comfort and joy.

Sanitation is still at a premium here. Smells from decaying vegetation, ditches and swamps, are not only unpleasant, but convey, as we believe, fever germs, as surely as do the mosquitoes. At certain seasons, insect life abounds, from the vampire down to the almost invisible sand-fly. One night, during our service, the air was full of millions of small green mosquitoes. A cloud of them hovered around, almost covering the open Bible. Frequently we had to brush them away in order to see to read. Our head, neck and hands were covered, but we had to "stand like the brave, with our face to the foe." But it was hard. The leaves of our Bible are disfigured by the stains of these little pestering creatures. But what of all this, when the Gospel is preached and men are saved! We invite your readers to help us in our evangelistic work here, and, as we go from place to place, to pray for us.

All London Stirred by a Revival

TWO months ago, London opened wide its arms to the Torrey-Alexander Mission. Vast crowds flocked day after day, and night after night, to the Royal Albert Hall. For seven and a-half weeks, London has been stirred. Thousands have publicly accepted Christ — these converts have included all classes—British and French noblemen, professional men, commanders in the army, actors and actresses, women in the highest society, and servant girls. There have perhaps been more men than women among the converts. In the Albert Hall Mission, the men's meetings have been the most successful of the whole series. For a couple of weeks, special mid-day services for business men were held in a large hotel in the city, and from the opening meeting they were crowded out. To these gatherings came many of the best-known men in London's vast commercial circles; Members of Parliament were daily in attendance, and the Lord Mayor was present on the platform one afternoon.

Three meetings for men only were held in Albert Hall, and at each of them the enthusiasm was wonderful. Perhaps the most remarkable gathering of the three was the second one. The building was filled to overflowing. Dr. Torrey spoke from the words, "He that is not with Me is against Me." It was a straight, manly talk all the way through.

No sooner was the invitation given out than men rose in every quarter of the large building. Then from the stalls a voice burst out with the prayer in song: "Oh, Lord, send the power just now." The whole audience took it up. Some one in the choir commenced a second time, and again all joined in singing it. When the hymn ended, a man in the arena rose, and said that his three little daughters had given their hearts to Jesus at the afternoon meeting, and his brother-in-law had just done the same. After Mr. Alexander had sung one verse of a hymn, a further appeal was made for decisions. The response was immediate. Standing to their feet, men all over the hall shouted. "I will."

Grouping the men on the platform, front and sides, and on the steps leading to the platform as well as up the broad middle aisle, Dr. Torrey called upon them to confess Christ before their fellow-men. There must have been fully three hundred men closely grouped together, and with one voice they made the confession: "I have taken Jesus as my Saviour, my Lord, my King."

The services held for children were also remarkable in results. A class of Jewish children was brought by their teacher. Picking out three of these children, Mr. Alexander asked them up beside him on the platform to sing the chorus of the "Sunbeam Song." They responded immediately, and on the high pedestal sang very nicely. As a reward for their pains, Mr. Alexander gave to each of the tiny tots a large hymn-book. A day or two later, Mr. Alexander received from the lady who had taken the girls to the meeting, a letter, in which she said that one of the little girls who sang was a real sunbeam at home. Fanny Shmolefski was her name.

"Her father," continued the writer of the letter, "has been in America for a year now, and the mother and four children have a hard struggle, but Fanny's faith keeps her mother through many a dark hour. The other day the mother said, 'I couldn't help crying a little—not much—for I did trust my Heavenly Father, but I just had notice to quit from the landlord, and I didn't know what we should do. Fanny came in and asked why I was crying, and said, "Mummy, have you forgotten our Father in heaven? Let's pray." So down she went on her knees, and told God how lonely and friendless and helpless they were. The answer came before the week was over in the form of a 'lodger girl,' who paid for half the room."

The very first man to stand up and confess Christ in the Albert Hall, is a colonel in the British army. Ever since taking that step, he has been among the hardest workers to bring others to Christ, and on several occasions he has publicly testified to the great joy that has come into his life. The conversion, however, whi has attracted the most attention, is that of Mr. Quent Ashlyn, a well-known society entertainer. Riding p the Albert Hall on the top of an omnibus, Mr. Ashl saw the crowds entering, and, more out of curiosity th anything else, he entered too. He left the buildi but little impressed. A few nights later, however, read a sermon on "Hell," by Dr. Torrey, and as he re the Holy Spirit carried home the words, and he saw need of a Saviour. Returning to the Albert Hall, confessed Christ before the multitude and declared intention of devoting himself to Christian work. T following afternoon he was to give an entertainment a popular West-End Hall. Going to the manager, tried to get that engagement cancelled, explaining t change that had come over his life; but he could not g away from it, the manager remarking that if he had an thing to say on the matter, had better say it himself. Wh he appeared on the platform was greeted with a round applause. A surprise awaite the audience. Without a introduction or apology, M Ashlyn briefly stated the fa that he had been converted the Albert Hall, and that future his life would not spent in amusing people, mar of whom were on the road hell, but in the service of t Saviour who had died for hir A feeling of solemnity can over the gathering when M Ashlyn, having made his co fession, quietly withdrew. C the following Sunday, he a peared on the platform of t same hall at religious service and told the story of his co version. Two actresses stoc up and accepted Christ. M Ashlyn has addressed variou meetings since.

A company of Cambridg students, having a vacatio attended the Mission in body and took part in th after meetings. One of th hardest workers all throug was Lord Kinnaird, Pres dent of the Evangelistic Cour cil. He is interested in a good works, and spends a large portion of his time an money in furthering worthy causes.

The closing meetings witnessed great scenes, crowd assembling at the hall hours before the services were t begin. I have tried to calculate the number of peopl who have assembled in the Albert Hall during th Mission, and making my estimate a very modest one I find that there have been 770,000 people present. Th Albert Hall Mission has cost $27,500, and the collection taken have amounted to over $20,000 — the larges ever taken in connection with a Mission in London

VON L. MEYER

AMBASSADOR VON L. MEYER has just been transferred from Italy, where he has served for a number of years, to the court of Russia. As President Roosevelt has been several times suggested as peacemaker between Japan and Russia, it is probable that Mr. Meyer will play a prominent part in European diplomacy for some time to come. He had a long experience in public life in Massachusetts, before entering the service of the national government. Mr. White, former first Secretary of the American Embassy at London, will take Mr. Meyer's place in Italy.

KING CHRISTIAN

KING CHRISTIAN of Denmark has recently celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday. It was the occasion of great rejoicing among the Danish people, for this truly knightly king is greatly beloved by his subjects. He has worked unceasingly for the welfare of his people, and is a patron of education, art and literature. Surrounded by powerful neighbors, he has had difficulty at times to preserve the peace and prosperity of Denmark. The loss of Schleswig-Holstein, for which he fought gallantly against the Germans, was a blow that is still felt by king and country.

LEE DE FOREST

LEE DE FOREST is the inventor of the De Forest system of wireless telegraphy, which is said to be, in some particulars, more practical than the one invented by Signor Marconi. This, of course, in no way detracts from the fame won by the Italian inventor, who has opened the way for other experimenters. Communication has been opened by the De Forest system between Kansas City, Chicago, St. Louis, Springfield, Ill., Port Huron, and Cleveland. Messages are sent at a cheaper rate than by wire. It is expected that regular communication will be had with the cities on the Atlantic coast within a few months. Last February a message was sent from Key West to Chicago, a distance of 1,300 miles.

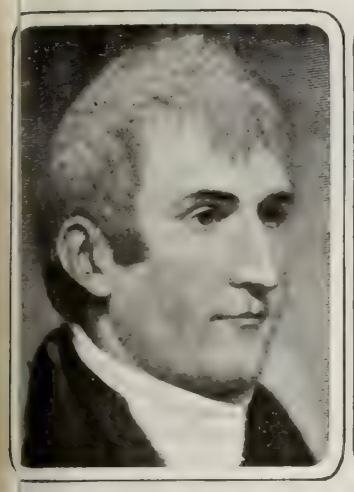
REV. H. SHIPMAN

WILLIAM H. ROCKHILL

REV. HERBERT SHIPMAN chaplain of the United States Military Academy at West Point, has been appointed senior assistant minister of the Church of the Heavenly Rest, in New York City, with the right of succession to the rectorate. Rev. D. Parker Morgan, D.D., is the present incumbent. Mr. Shipman was educated at Columbia University and the General Theological Seminary. He was appointed chaplain at the Military Academy nine years ago. He is an effective speaker, and has great influence with young men. It is expected that he will preach his first sermon in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, on May 7.

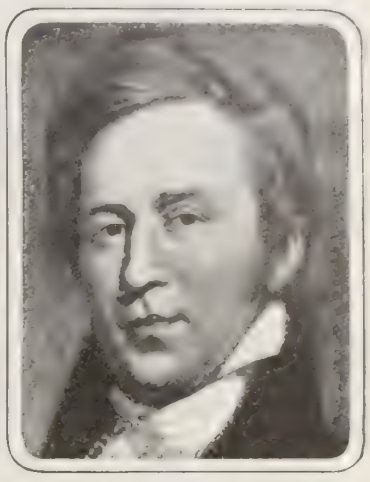
WILLIAM W. ROCKHILL has been appointed by President Roosevelt, American Minister to China, succeeding Mr. Conger. Mr. Rockhill will have the arduous task of preventing the dismemberment of China, and keeping "the open door" for American trade. The United States alone has been the means of preserving the integrity of the Chinese Empire, and the note to the Powers at the commencement of the present war is regarded as a master-stroke of diplomacy. Most of the European Powers have been wishing for the break-up of the land of the Celestials, but have been less aggressive since American opposition has become so manifest.

THE NORTHWEST HONORS THE ARGONAUTS



MERIWETHER LEWIS

THE LEWIS AND CLARK EXPOSITION AT PORTLAND, OREGON



WILLIAM CLARK

ONE hundred years ago last May, a small party of men, some dressed in the blue uniform of the United States Army, others in the fringed and beaded hunting suits of the frontiersman, gathered on the banks of Wood River, where it empties into the Mississippi, opposite the mouth of the Missouri. Late in the afternoon, when the sun was dropping rapidly down the Western sky, they embarked in three boats, the largest over fifty feet long, with a large sail and banks of oars on each side. A command, and twenty-two brawny bodies bent back as one; twenty-two oars churned the surface of the Father of Waters into foam, and the expedition of Lewis and Clark was under way.

These American argonauts, as a result of their long journey to the headwaters of the Missouri, and onward to the mouth of the Columbia River, in what is now the State of Oregon, on the Pacific coast, gave to the American people the first accurate information in regard to the great territory acquired from France by the greatest American expansionist, Thomas Jefferson.

The Northwest intends to commemorate the centennial of this great exploration, and will open next month, a Lewis and Clark Exposition, at Portland, Ore. The Exposition site has been made so beautiful by nature that the work of the landscape architect seems hardly necessary. There are many hills and vales, and a beautiful river studded with islets, which will be connected by many ornamental bridges. The city itself seems set in a frame of green forests, and on the horizon may be seen the stately and lofty peaks of Mount Hood, Mount St. Helens, Mount Rainier, and Mount Adams. The Exposition buildings are well along toward completion.

The Government is taking great interest in the project, and the entire United States exhibit that was at St. Louis, with many additions, will be taken to Portland. The managers of the Exposition do not intend to copy any other Exposition, but to make it distinctive of the history, progress and industries of the great States interested. It is this very fact that will make the Exposition of such interest to visitors from the Eastern States. About everything they see will be something entirely new to them, or of what they heard only from books.

The Forestry Building alone is worth a long journey to see. It is built entirely of giant logs that average thirty-two tons apiece. If these logs were placed end to end, they would extend five miles; the poles would extend eight. Architecturally the building is a masterpiece of construction. There is also an Oriental Exhibits Building, Agricultural Building, European Building, Machinery, Electricity, and Transportation Building, Festival Hall, Mines and Metallurgy Building, Fine Arts Building, and Buildings of Varied Industries.

Thirty-four conventions will be held during the Exposition, including the American Medical Association, National Conference of Charities and Corrections, National Good Roads Association, American Library Association, and Order of Railway Conductors. There will be an important educational conference besides conferences dealing with Indian Affairs, Relation of the United States to the Far East, Employer and Employee, etc. Prominent educators from American and foreign universities will attend, members of the cabinet (Secretary Taft is to take a prominent part), members of Congress, Governors of States and men prominent in the world of letters, prominent artists and captains of industry.

The interest in the Fair has extended to other countries; and among those that will send exhibits are Great Britain, Canada, Belgium, Egypt, Korea, Siam, Russia, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, Italy, Japan, China, Turkey, Sweden and Norway, Austria-Hungary and Turkey. Various States have appropriated a total of $790,000; the city of Portland, $400,000, the State of Oregon, $450,000, the United States, $475,000.

Emperor William in Morocco

A GATE OF TANGIERS

A GOOD example of the instability of European politics is furnished by the recent visit of the German Emperor to Morocco, although we are apt, in this country, to regard the present relations of France, Germany, and the other European countries, as well assured. France for some time has enjoyed the predominant influence in Morocco, an influence which our own Department of State has tacitly recognized. Emperor William of Germany has been journeying about the Mediterranean, and after having given due notice to the French Government, he paid a visit to the picturesque city of Tangiers, and its equally picturesque Sultan. The Emperor wore a large white helmet, and a long flowing bournous, so that he did not seem at all out of place in the midst of the barbaric splendor of the Moorish Court.

The Emperor was most cordially received by the people of Tangiers. There is a large number of Germans in the city, and much of the commercial prosperity of the country is due to them. The Germans gave a number of fetes in honor of the Kaiser and the officers and men of the warships that accompanied him. The German population has undoubtedly felt the pressure that has been recently brought to bear by French officials, acting in behalf of French commercial interest. The French wish to have absolute control, and the Germans, in consequence, made the most of the Kaiser's visit, which they regard as an assurance that the Fatherland will protect their interests.

The Sultan held several conferences with the Kaiser, and he was apparently delighted that he could have some one to support him in his present difficult position. For the last three years the wild tribesmen of the desert have been in a state of rebellion, and the kidnapping of Perdicaris is still fresh in the public mind. To quiet the disturbed districts the Sultan has had to humiliate himself to the extent of appointing the kidnapper as governor of a province. This appointment has caused great rejoicing among European residents, as it will restore tranquility to an important part of the country. France has given military aid to the Sultan in his recent troubles, thus helping him to forge his own chains.

THE KAISER, WEARING HIS BOURNOUS

THE SULTAN OF MOROCCO.

The French Government says it attaches no diplomatic importance to the visit, and in no way will change her line of conduct, "the object of which is to strengthen the Sultan's authority, and to bring about order, prosperity and calm in the large empire submitted to her influence, while safeguarding the commercial interests of the European powers." The French people, on the other hand, became quite alarmed over this manifestation of German interest; but such alarm has become a habit with Jaques Bonhomme since the days of Worth and Sedan. The newspapers of Paris excitedly denounced the Kaiser, and published a spurious photograph representing him as a Moor, wearing a belt full of knives, yataghans and pistols, and the full outfit of a Mohammedan brigand.

Emperor William made a speech, that seems reasonable enough to the average onlooker, who is not looking for some of his neighbor's territory that is not securely tied down. He practically ignored the French claim to the suzerainty of Morocco, and treated the Sultan as an independent sovereign. The "up-to-dateness" of the Sultan has caused much uneasiness to his backward subjects. He is well up in modern mechanics, rides a bicycle, and late reports say that he is becoming interested in motoring. His army, composed of sturdy sons of the desert, gaudy in fez and zouave jackets, has been well drilled by that gallant soldier of fortune, Kaid Sir Harry Maclean.

At the Lord's Table

A READER of this journal in Trenton, Calif., sends us the following letter, concerning a subject which is of interest to the great majority of our readers in other States:

> Must one be a Church member and a professed Christian before he can have the privilege of partaking of the Lord's Supper? How may we know whether we are fitted to partake of the Sacrament or not?

In recent years there has been a considerable modification of the views held in many churches relative to the sacramental invitation. In some, it is still customary to restrict the invitation to those who are members of the church in good standing. In others, the Communion invitation is extended to all who are members of any Christian church. Again, there are others that take a still more latitudinarian view, and freely invite "all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, and call upon his name," to sit at the Lord's table.

From their different standpoints, all may be right. We ourselves confess a preference for the more liberal view, which would not exclude from the Lord's table any Christian man or woman, who, by that very act, would be making public confession of belief in Jesus as Saviour. At the same time, it should not be forgotten that the Lord's Supper is a most solemn sacrament, which should not be partaken of lightly nor without due spiritual preparation. This fact should be clearly set forth in the invitation, lest some might come who, being totally unprepared, could not participate in the proper spirit.

In many of the churches in former days, a certain period was devoted to the work of spiritual preparation for the sacrament. Repentance and days of heart-searching and prayer preceded the renewal of vows and pledges. Our modern liberal church methods have developed a tendency to disregard this excellent plan. Pastors who extend a general invitation would do well to make this duty of preparation clear to those who may be disposed to respond. There would then be less danger of that "eating and drinking unworthily," of which Paul warned the Church in Corinth. Every precaution should be taken to prevent the degradation of the sacred commemoration to the level of a common social function, devoid of all spiritual significance.

Should Women Wear Hats in Church?

IF a woman goes to church to worship God, the question of head-gear will not trouble her very much. She will always go with a feeling of reverence. A church dedicated to the worship of the living God should be holy ground, and vanity and kindred weaknesses of the flesh should be left outside as far as possible. The woman who goes to church to show her fine clothes, of course would be averse to removing that which has cost her so much in thought and money—her beautiful hat! The more conspicuous it is the less inclined will she be to remove it, even to accommodate her neighbor in the pew behind, who may be pardoned for wishing to secure an occasional glimpse of the minister, and an idea of the geographical locality of the pulpit.

There is a point in the hat question, however, where forbearance ceases. This is reached when the towering structure is not only an inconvenience to others, but is a means of distracting the thoughts of worshipers, disturbing their devotions, and perhaps exciting in the minds of some weak sisters feelings of envy, to say nothing of divers emotions stirred in the breasts of the brothers who know the size of the milliners' bills.

It may be possible to worship God in spirit and in truth, when one's head is surmounted by a pile of feathers, flowers and lace, which looks as if it had been run over by an auto or a trolley-car—being bent into so many grotesque angles—but the spiritual part would seem to have small chance, and if the preacher happened to touch bluntly on human vanity, we doubt if the truth would prove acceptable. One would think that a sense of the eternal fitness of things should admonish a woman that when she goes to church she should dress modestly and inconspicuously. If a hat is worn for style and ornament merely, it is entirely out of place in the House of God. If it is of reasonable proportions, and worn as a shield against heat or cold, it might be a question whether it should be removed upon entering church.

We note that some of our correspondents quote Paul as authority for the retention of the modern church hat. Nothing could be farther from the apostle's meaning. Paul, having in mind the "new idea" of equality which was prompting the women of Cornith to do strange things, warned the godly women of the Christian Church not to discard their veils, as those froward sisters had done, but to retain their modesty and self-respect, especially in the Lord's House. He said nothing about hats or bonnets, as such things were unknown in Greece; but had he ever faced an audience such as we see in our churches to-day, in which towering "picture hats" obscure preacher and platform to half the number present, he would have exhausted the vocabulary of apostolic denunciation in rebuking the vanity and foolishness of the show.

We trust that the present agitation of the Church Hat question in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will not be unproductive of good results. It may not solve the problem; but it will, at least, show the way to a reasonable compromise, by which proper reverence, common sense and the rights of our neighbor worshipers may be duly recognized. It is not a question of "hat or no hat," so much as of a style of head-gear that will be reasonable in size, sensible and becoming, and which will not obstruct the view of others, nor disturb the serenity of the service, as the mountainous and billowy millinery of the prevailing fashion now too often does.

Fraudulent Projects

FRAUD orders issued recently by Postmaster-General Cortelyou, should operate as a warning to people who seek to obtain a high rate of interest for their savings. The evidence on which the orders were issued showed that enormous numbers of persons had been shamelessly victimized. Not less than one million, and probably two or three million, dollars had been obtained from comparatively poor people, by promises to pay ten per cent. at once, and a much greater amount ultimately. The trick appears to have been to organize a company to purchase six thousand acres of land in Mexico, represented to be rich in coffee and rubber, and three thousand equally valuable in Louisiana. It was set forth that the properties were capable of unlimited development, and stock and bonds were issued for $750,000 in the one case, and $2,200,000 in the other. In order to reach the unsophisticated investor, these bonds might be purchased on monthly instalments. The money poured in, but very little of it was applied to the purpose stated. The bulk of it went into the pockets of the promoters, who appear to have figured as sellers as well as purchasers of the property. During the process of developing the fraud, the money of later investors was used to pay the ten per cent. dividend as promised, so as to encourage other investors. When the time was ripe, the chief promoter seized the funds and fled to Europe, leaving the treasury empty.

That the victims will recover any part of the money out of which they have been swindled is improbable. The only consolation left them is that the loss is not greater. They were still sending in their monthly instalments when the fraud was detected. These will be returned to them under the Postmaster-General's fraud order, and they will send no more. It was a wicked, cruel scheme, and all the more despicable because it was specially designed to reach a class of people who could ill-afford to lose the money. The literature and the plans of the schemers were made so attractive, that persons who were not accustomed to operations in stocks, were deceived, and were drawn in by the lavish promises of immediate and prospective gains. Doubtless many who had worked hard and lived frugally to accumulate a provision for sickness and old age, are now mourning the loss of their precious savings.

This is unhappily a typical instance of many swindles. Shrewd schemers know that they have only to bait their hook with the promise of high interest and they will be sure to attract a number of credulous people. As THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has frequentl pointed out to its readers, there is no genuine schem that needs to adopt such methods. All the capital tha is required can be obtained on easy terms when the busi ness is legitimate. The very fact of high interest bein promised, should of itself put the public on its guard It means that the security is bad, and that in investing the victim will probably lose capital and interest both

Some Exploded Military Theories

A NUMBER of popular theories in regard to moder warfare have been upset by the present conflic in the Far East. Ever since the adoption of the maga zine rifle and the invention of the machine gun, it ha been generally predicted that armies would fight almos out of sight of one another, and as time went on wa would cease, from the very destructiveness of the weap ons employed. This was believed, in part, by hig military authorities, and many changes were made i the tactics in use.

The Japanese war shows a far different result fro the one expected. The modern high power rifle wi kill a man at a great distance, if the bullet hits som vital part; but the bullet is not any larger than a ver small pencil, and is driven with such force that i passes through flesh and bone, without tearing or shat tering. In consequence, ordinary wounds take but short time to heal, and there are many cases reporte where a man did not know he had been injured until th battle was over. The old-fashioned gun, shooting large lead ball, was far more deadly to anything tha came within its range. The modern magazine gun ha not been able to stop men from coming to close quar ters. No war since the days "of push of pike" has ha so many desperate hand-to-hand conflicts, where col steel, backed by human prowess, has settled the fo tunes of the day. The Japanese have made fronta attacks, regarded as impossible, and have charged ove pits and up the very face of modern fortifications. The have been taught to have faith in the bayonet, and th war shows the result. The United States governmen has recently begun the manufacture of a new rifle a the Springfield Arsenal. This rifle was to have a smal ramrod bayonet that would pull out about six inche from the muzzle of the gun. It would be useless i such fighting as the world has seen in Manchuria, and board is now considering the advisability of returnin to the more serviceable weapon.

It may be that there is such a thing as fashion i military tactics, for we are nearer, with all our moder appliances and brutal man-killing methods, to "th brave days of old" than for generations past. We stil seem to be a very long way off from that happy an peaceful time when men "shall beat their swords int ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Russia and Japan

RUSSIAN warships were reported as late as April 21 to be anchored in Kamranh Bay, off the coast of Cochin China. As this bay is under the control of the French Government, Japan turally protests against the hospitality thus given to enemy. If the assertion is proven, that the Russian et is taking in coal and warlike stores, it is clear that e French are committing a breach of the neutrality ws, as they did at Madagascar. Japan is highly in-gnant at such help being given to her foe by a Power th whom she is nominally on friendly terms, and she is ported to have made vigorous protest in Paris. The ench Foreign Minister has made excuses and protesta-ons, which are obviously intended to deceive, with ich, for the present, Japan must be satisfied. It is obable that France will heed the protest, because if e openly sided with Russia, Japan would have the ght, under her treaty, to call Great Britain for assist-ce.

Up to April 22, Admiral go had refrained from at-cking the Russian fleet. It pears to be his policy to ake harassing raids on the lliers that are carrying al to Rojestvensky, and pturing them before they ach the fleet. The coal elf will be useful to Togo; t the chief value of his ctics consists in his depriv-g his enemy of the coal, at is essential to his safety. small squadron consisting a battleship, an armored uiser, and several smaller ssels, under the command Vice-Admiral Niebogatoff, being hurried to Rojest-nsky's assistance. Should junction be made between ese two Russian fleets, the panese would be over-atched to a considerable tent in number and in ton-ge. They would still, how-er, have the inestimable dvantage of having in com-and an able tactician in position to a rash, bungling, incapable seaman. That e expected battle has not already occurred is an evi-ence of Togo's caution, and his plan to fight at a point dvantageous to himself.

There appears to have been a lull in the operations n land. The Japanese forces are quietly making their ay northward, apparently intending to cut off the Rus-an retreat. The Russian general has a front extend-g from Chanchung on the west to Kirin on the east. en. Oyama is threatening it on the west, while Kuroki approaching it from the south and a third army locks the way to Vladivostok. The suffering of the ounded is extreme. They lack hospital supplies, and e patients have to undergo operations without an-sthetics. The medical staff has been decimated by eath and the survivors are overworked. The accom-anying illustration shows the horrors of a field hospi-al, in which the sufferers are obliged to endure agony ithout the alleviating appliances that modern surgery rovides for the wounded All this misery, wretched-ess and death are the result of the greed of a govern-ent which craves more territory, while that it already ossesses is misgoverned.

Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not (James 4: 2).

RUSSIAN WOUNDED IN A FIELD HOSPITAL AFTER A BATTLE

emains of Paul Jones Found

The long search conducted by our Ambassador to rance, General Porter, for the body of Paul Jones, has een crowned with success. For five years he has been atiently searching for the remains of the famous American sailor. Workmen have been tunneling and cross-tunneling the cemetery in Paris, where he was believed to be interred, and the entire expense was borne by Gen. Porter, Congress having neglected to concur in the President's suggestion to provide for the search. At last a lead coffin was found, which appeared likely to be the one sought. On being opened, the body was found to be well preserved, though it was one hundred and thirteen years since it was buried. The features bore a striking resemblance to the medallions and busts of the famous naval warrior. The corpse was sent to two professors of the School of Anthropology in Paris, with all the evidence obtainable as to the appearance, height and measurements of Paul Jones. After a careful examination the identity was fully established. It had been prepared for shipment to America at the time of burial, in expectation that the American Congress would claim it. It is to be brought to New York and will doubtless receive a patriotic welcome. Though his enemies called him a pirate, and his government slighted him and let his body lie so long in foreign soil, the bold, reckless fighter, is at last to lie in the land he loved and served so devotedly. Little enough does it concern him now where his bones lie, but the nation owed it to itself that the hero's precious dust should be redeemed from foreign soil. It is all that it can do, for his spirit has passed beyond its power to honor. The most distinguished patriot must share the common lot when he dies.

Their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in anything that is done under the sun (Eccles. 9 : 6).

Rescued from a Rock

Two boys, aged about thirteen, living in New York, recently became the proud possessors of a skiff, for which they paid three dollars. A great deal of repairing had to be done before it would stay on top of the water, but the boys were delighted with it, and looked forward to the day when they could make their first voyage in their own boat. They started out early in the afternoon with all the other boys on the dock watching them with envious eyes. They rowed to North Beach and then started back again. On the way home, around the east side of Rikers Island, the bottom of the skiff scraped a rock, and, in a minute, so much water poured into the boat, that the boys concluded they had better vacate it. They got on a big rock and dragged the boat as far out of the water as they could. The tide was low then, and as the two sailors were some hundred yards from Rikers Island, they concluded they would hail a passing craft and be rescued. They had been two hours on the rock when they began to get frightened at the rising tide. Something had to be done, and the youngsters tied their handkerchiefs together. These were tied to an oar and held aloft. They were seen from a police boat and rescued from their perilous position. They had named their boat Happy Days. Later on in the voyage of life they may find that other hopes of pleasure similarly end in disaster. Happy for them, then, if they appeal for rescue to One who is mighty to save.

I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord (Ps. 121: 1, 2).

Captured by a Convict

Among the romances of prison life related by an ex-warden is the story of a remarkable recapture, by a convict, of prisoners who had broken jail. It appears that the Governor of Virginia, with a party of friends, was visiting an important prison in that State. The arrival of the distinguished visitors caused some excitement, in the midst of which four of the convicts seized rifles and made a dash for liberty. Their escape was not noticed at first, except by another convict, who volunteered to an officer to recapture the leader, a notorious and desperate offender. Permission was given, and immediately the chase began. Gradually the fugitives became aware that they were being overtaken, and they turned and pointed their rifles at their pursuer, warning him by shouts that they would kill him rather than be caught. Heedless of threats and shots, the pursuing convict held on his way until he had the leader in his hands, and disarmed him. The delay of the struggle was fatal to the remainder of the party. The guards, who had followed in the chase, came up and overcame the other three convicts and brought them back. The Governor was so much pleased by the courage and promptitude of the convict who had captured the leader that, then and there, he remitted the remainder of his sentence, covering two years. Doubtless the reward of his freedom was the most acceptable that could have been given to the convict. He earned it by bringing other wrongdoers back into captivity. It is not so with the Christian, his reward is gained by bringing others to freedom.

Let him know that he who converteth a sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins (James 5 : 20).

BRIEF NOTES

The Rev. Bernhard Pick, Ph.D., D.D., for the last two years in the literary department of Funk & Wagnalls, has been called to Newark, N. J., as pastor of the German Evangelical Lutheran St. John's Church.

Dr. Ezra T. Sanford, D.D., has received a call from the North Baptist Church, West Eleventh St., New York. His installation takes place on May 3. The sermon will be preached by Dr. A. G. Lawson, of Newark, N. J.

The annual meeting of the American Tract Society will be held in Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on May 14. The annual address will be delivered by Dr. James L. Barton, D.D., the Foreign Secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Dr. Barton's experience as a missionary in Turkey qualifies him to speak of the value of the Society's work.

Dr. W. P. George, who has been ministering to the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church of Denver, Colo., has received from the Quarterly Conference an enthusiastic tribute of appreciation. The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the close of his term of service: "Although coming to us [illegible] service, Rev. William Potts George, LL. D., has taken up the duties with a zeal and devotion that could not be surpassed if he had expected to remain for years. An able preacher and faithful pastor, he has won the hearts of our people and the respect of the community. Wherever he may be called to labor hereafter, the love and prayers of all the members of the Quarterly Conference will be ever with him."

SPRING'S PROMISE AT MONT-LAWN

THE trees have clothed themselves in robes of tender green. Spring flowers are peeping from their warm beds, where they have slumbered the winter through. Snow-drops, anemones, hepatica, and violets lift their shy heads, while the wild, red columbine swings its graceful blooms from clefts among the rock, upon the hillside. The broad bosom of the Hudson glows with jewels of sunshine.

Mayday skies are all aglow
And the waves are laughing so.

The birds have returned from their southern sojourn; nature's sleep is over, and awakening, she stretches a warm hand in glad greeting to all. Gay, smiling, budding, blooming, sweet spring has come, while the merry feathered songsters join in a chorus of praise.

At every turn, one meets the joyous beauty, the first fulfilment of the wonderful promise of spring. Having weathered the storms and rude blasts of winter, there stand our old friends, the everlasting hills, all glory-crowned, uplifting their proud heads as if to guard the beauteous scene. In another month the beauty of Mont-Lawn will be unfolded, and one may seek the shade of the wide-spreading trees, as a protection from the rays of a too ardent sun. A few more weeks, and hill and valley, lawn and veranda will re-echo with the merry shouts of children at play —little children who, in their miserable, crowded homes in the metropolis, watch with almost painful eagerness the springing of any chance blade of grass they may spy in the great pavement-covered city, and the bursting of the buds on the trees, if their homes are near one of the little parks, bounded upon either side by tall tenements. These signs mean so much to the poor children; they are spring's promise that summer will soon be here, and then — Mont-Lawn!

In the crowded tenements, where many families have but one room, and that stuffy and ill-ventilated, the "little mothers" are already telling their small charges of the lovely times they will have at the Children's Home. Little Jennie was not big enough to go last year, but all winter long, sister Nellie has been keeping up the flagging spirits of the child by wonderful stories of what happened last summer at that enchanted place, and what she is so sure will happen again this year.

"You don't have to sleep and eat and do the washing all in one room," explained Nellie. "You have the nicest little white bed, and it is not turned up against the wall, like ours, to make room for mamma's wash-tubs; but just think, Jennie, there are rows and rows of these beds—all white—and with pretty pictures on the walls, and signs over some of the beds telling what good lady paid for it. I should think the ladies would be awful proud to have their names up in such a nice place. When I get big and growed up, I am going to earn money and buy a bed, and have my name on the wall. Won't that be nice, Jennie?"

"Yes," answered little Jennie, "that's all right, but when I get big enough, I'm going to run away; I runned away once, 'n I had a norful good time. I looked in all the windows where there was cakes and candies, 'n a norful lots of good things to eat, 'n they made me hungrier, 'n I cried; nen a big man in a big coat wiv brass buttons picked me up, 'n tooked me to a place what had lots more men wiv brass buttons on their coats; 'n I cried some more 'cause I was awful tired 'n hungry, 'n nen they gived me such a great big piece of bread, 'n all the milk I could drink, 'n I went to sleep, 'n that's why I'm goin' to run away ag'in."

IN A CROWDED TENEMENT HOME

"But mamma had a dreadful time finding you, til she went to the station-house," said Nellie, "and you must not run away again. When we go up to Mont Lawn, you can have all the bread and milk you want and lots of other nice things, too."

"Oh, well!" replied Miss Wanderfoot, "I guess when I do run away ag'in, I'll go to Mont-Lawn."

The poor mothers of the tenements will be doubly grateful this season for the beneficence of the Children' Home. It has been a hard struggle with many families this winter, to keep bodies and souls together. With the finishing of the great underground railway, and other big public works, where thousands of men were employed and strikes which threw other thousands out of work New York has been filled in certain localities with men whose families as well as themselves have been upon the verge of starvation.

They have managed somehow to live and now with the advent of spring things look a little brighter. The brunt of the battle usually falls upon the women when the men are out of work Many of them bravely take up the burden of wage-earning — washing scrubbing, cleaning offices, etc.—and all this in addition to the home work and care of children. No wonder the poor little things are neglected; no wonder they sicken and die, and the undertakers are kept busy furnishing the pitiful little caskets for the "Rosies" and "Mamies," the "Jimmies" and "Tommies," who were the joy of the tenement home, before they succumbed to conditions their parents were unable to change. What glorious news it will be to these mothers when they are told that Mont-Lawn stands ready with open doors to welcome the children for ten beautiful days in the country, where good food, fresh air, and the best of care from loving attendants, soon put roses in the pale cheeks, and bring brightness to the eye dulled by want and illness.

While Mont-Lawn is being made ready for its tiny guests, nature is doing its best with out-of-doors, supplemented by the cunning of trained hands, with pruning knife and spade, rake and other garden tools, which will soon put the ground in most beautiful order, while the promise of spring is being graciously fulfilled. The children are patiently waiting, shall we not make 1905 the banner season for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home?

TO DRIVE ACROSS THE CONTINENT

ONE of the most picturesque outfits for itinerant mission work ever used in this country, is that in which the Rev. J. W. Harrison and his wife made a trip of some three thousand miles recently, and in which they propose to travel again this spring and summer. The inscription on either side of the wagon was as follows: "The Gospel Wagon of an Aged Couple on a long Journey—New York to Atlanta and Back." Mr. Harrison and wife were born in England, about seventy years ago, and since becoming Christians have been active workers. A few years ago Mr. Harrison lost his health through business worry and discouragements. His wife suggested that they take a trip and live in the open air, and preach by the way. He accepted the suggestion, and being of a mechanical turn of mind (he was a smith in his younger days) he constructed a wagon with his own hands. It is a model of convenience for traveling and housekeeping. Along the sides are lockers in which are carried clothing, cooking utensils, small supplies of food and other things for the journey. The bed is so built that it is drawn up to the top of the wagon cover in the daytime, and at night is let down into the wagon. When it is lowered, it closes up the front end of the wagon completely, and shuts out the world. The driver's seat serves as a table. In the two back corners are cupboards or corner shelves. The entrance to this "house on wheels" is at the rear, by means of a stepladder that works like a drawbridge, and is let down or raised by means of chains.

This aged couple started from New York in this modernized "prairie schooner," September 21, 1903, and traveled through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, to Atlanta, where they arrived early the following March. They traveled leisurely, stopping about a week at a time in the larger towns and cities. They cooked, ate, and slept in their wagon. They used an oil stove for heating and cooking purposes, and two large lanterns for illuminating "the house." Frequently, in extreme weather, they found shelter for "Baby," the old black mare, in some friendly nearby barn. They bought their provisions of farmers along the way. Reaching a town, they would go to the Mayor's office and procure a permit to hold street meetings. The announcement of service at the public square or a certain street corner would invariably bring out a crowd. Mr. Harrison usually began the public service with a few selections on the graphophone. Then he would tell them the story of his trip and of his conversion. At other times he would read a Scripture lesson and preach a simple discourse, setting before them the way of life and salvation.

MR. AND MRS. HARRISON AND THEIR GOSPEL WAGON

The outgoing journey ended at Atlanta, where their fame had preceded them, and where the Mayor entertained them at his own house for more than a week. Their return was by way of Chattanooga, Nashville, Bowling Green, Lexington, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburg, Harrisburg and to New York.

No collections were called for. "How then did they pay their way?" is a pertinent question At the close of the service at any place, Mr Harrison would tell the people he was not asking them to give him a single thing, for they were making their own way, by selling patent potato peelers of his own make. At this he would show them the peeler, and demonstrate its value by peeling potatoes before them. He sold enough at ten cents each, to pay their way on the entire journey of twelve months.

Now, he and Mrs. Harrison have started on a still longer wagon trip from New York to San Francisco, going through the central part of the United States, via Pittsburg, Columbus, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Kansas City and Denver. They expect to winter in Colorada; they will then proceed to the Pacific Coast sometime in the spring of 1906. On this trip, they hope to sell and give away many Bibles and Testaments.

THE RESURRECTION OF MISS CYNTHIA

By FLORENCE MORSE KINGSLEY

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Miss Cynthia Day had been for years under the ntrol of rigid and harsh grandparents, as well da severe mother. All the natural inclinations girlhood had been suppressed. After the death her relatives, she continues the same narrow istence, economizing from habit, and ably as- ted in this by the old servant, Abby Whiton. oubled by a pain in her chest she visits a doc- , who shocks her with the announcement at she has only a year to live. Her whole soul bels against the thought of death. She meets e Puffer twins, and she joins them in her first n down hill, and also accepts an invitation to ir picnic, much to Abby Whiton's annoyance. e twins stray off, and Cynthia, searching for em, loses her way and is found by George ossom, a young house-painter, with decorative bitions. On the way home she engages him paint and paper the Breyfogle house. Abby hiton endeavors, but in vain, to assert her old- ne power in the house, and at last Cynthia cides to dismiss her, and writes her a note of scharge, inclosing $50 extra "for long and faith- l service."

HALF an hour later, Abby Whiton, reconnoitring the premises from an upper window, was thunderstruck to behold er mistress, in the full panoply f her best gown, being assisted by eorge Blossom into his new phaeton. his was the last drop in the overflow- ng cup of her indignities. "Fer the an's sake!" she cried, "Ef she ain't one silly daft over that boy! It's all lear to me now. Well, I'd a sight ruther have laid her out than to see er makin' a fool of herself."

Functions of a mortuary nature had lways proved more congenial to the omewhat gloomy tastes of Miss Whi- on than anything in the way of love nd matrimony. She was accustomed o look down upon all "men-folks" rom a Matterhorn-like peak of maiden corn; but for "young fellers," such as George Blossom, she felt an unqualified contempt. "Why, he ain't hardly out o' short pants!" she told herself iercely, as she hurried down to the ower regions for further investigations. "More'n likely she hadn't no dee I meant a word I said 'bout goin'; out she'll find she's mistook. I ain't -goin to be tromped on by nobody."

As a matter of fact, Miss Whiton had as yet made no move toward actual preparations for leaving, beyond ostentatiously emptying her wardrobe. 'M' closet's got to be cleaned out, anyhow," she had reflected; "I might's well do it to-day as any other day."

She had decided further that she would allow Miss Cynthia to have the house painted on the outside. "'Tain't goin' to hurt me any, an' I guess the's spots along the gutters 'at needs it," she admitted. "I reelly hadn't noticed. As fer the paperin,' ef she's s' awful set on makin' a change I do' know as I care if the parlor an' settin'-room's done."
